Big Sugar Output in Salt River Valley

BY LLOYD C. THOMAS.

The run of the Glendale sugar factory, about seven miles from Phoenix, in the Salt River Valley of Arizona, for the present season has just closed. The sugar made from the beets grown there is said to be in every way equal to the finest cane sugar and much of it is used by bottlers and druggists in syrup making, which is the hardest test to which sugar can be put.

Fifty thousand bags, or five million pounds, or two thousand five hundred tons of beet sugar was made this year. The value of this amount of sugar is over three hundred thousand dollars. The magnitude of this industry in the famous Salt River Valley can be seen from these figures.
When the writer left the valley on June 14th some of the beets were then ready to be made into sugar, the run starting just about the time we left. The very rich Glendale "loess" in which the beets are grown makes a very heavy yield, some of the beets having as high as twenty-five per cent pure sugar.

The same force that is used in the Glendale sugar factory is sent when through-there to the factories owned by the sugar company in Colorado, and undoubtedly some of them will be put to work in the factory at Scottsbluff. The crops in the Salt River Valley have all been harvested long ago and many of the second crops are in the ground. It certainly seems rather odd to hear people talk of growing two and even three crops per year on the same ground but this is the case there. Alfalfa is green the entire year and is cut from five to eight times, depending upon the amount of pasturing done on it during the winter season. For about six weeks in the winter there the cattle are pastured on the alfalfa.

C. C. Joy, of Jess, Nebraska, who is well known to Box Butte and Alliance people, stopped the writer on the street one day last week and put the following question:
"Say, Thomas, do you know of any place on earth that beats that Salt River Valley?" Mr. Joy has just returned from an extended trip in Arizona, California and other southern states. He says that as soon as he sees his head in Nebraska it is Arizona and the Salt River Valley for him. Mr. Joy arrived in Phoenix the same day the writer left so not much opportunity was had for a visit. A man cannot help liking a country where for miles and miles one rides between green alfalfa fields, tall stately trees, full ditches of swiftly running water and fruit orchards of every kind on all sides.

And living is not expensive in the Salt River Valley. One can rent a little cottage in Phoenix cheaply and already furnished, or a small suburban tract can be purchased on easy terms. Street car lines radiate through the valley in all directions and they are being rapidly extended to cover the entire district.

The small Arizona desert cactus in the Herald office window attracts a good deal of attention. Although it is only a couple of feet in height this kind grows to a height of thirty or forty feet on the dry deserts.

A. S. Reed Buys Farm in Salt River Valley

Will Become a Resident of the New State Soon.

A. S. Reed, who left on a trip to the Salt River Valley about two weeks ago returned Tuesday morning. Mr. Reed saw the valley in its "worst aspect" and he says that the highest temperature experienced while there was 102 degrees while in Nebraska it went up to 108 during the same time. Mr. Reed selected a sixty acre farm two miles west of Phoenix on the "Christy" road, which is a paved boulevard and is one of the finest in the valley. His farm is directly across the road from a fine five room brick school house which makes it very handy for the family.

The writer remembers the place purchased by Mr. Reed very well and he certainly has used good judgement in picking out a home. Forty acres of the place are in alfalfa and the place has fine trees and shrubbery. Mr. Reed paid $75 per acre for this farm. He says it cost him just six times as much as he got for his land in Nebraska but he would rather have it than ten for a home.

While in the valley Mr. Reed spent the ten days he was there at the home of Stanley Howard, an old Box Butte county resident. He slept out of doors most of the time, had to have quilts every night, and didn't see a mosquito. He brought up a few specimens of fruit raised by Stanley Howard on his place. Stanley Howard has many peaches that weigh one-half pound each and other fruits in proportion. Stanley Howard has had fruit ever since May 24th.

Mr. Reed saw many pieces of seed alfalfa which were going 500 pounds to the acre, the seed selling for $12.75 per 100 pounds. Says building is going on at an immense rate in the valley and knows of no better place to invest than right there.
Mr. Reed asked the writer not to mention some things which he saw in the Valley, especially with regard to the size of fruit, etc., for he said, "If you tell the truth it wouldn't be believed." Melons have been harvested once and the second crop is being planted on the same ground. The farm was purchased through the agency of Dwight B. Heard, with whom the writer is working. Anyone who is interested should see Mr. Reed and have a talk with him. He is known as a conservative man.
Anyone who is interested in the Valley should call or write the writer and literature will be furnished with maps, etc.
