WESTERN FARMERS' DANGER

There is a plain and simple lesson taught by the agricultural history of this country which should be considered, for it shows the futility of all reasoning in favor of the agreement based upon the selling prices of wheat in the world's markets. From this lesson it may be learned that it is not the price at which wheat may be sold but the cost of its production which determines whether free trade in Canadian wheat would injure the farming interests of the west. When the cheap lands of the middle west were brought under cultivation immediately after the Civil war, agriculture in the eastern part of this country began to decline; and yet it was as true then as it is now that the price of wheat was made, not in the west, but in the east and in Europe. Notwithstanding eastern farmers were nearer than western farmers to the market to be supplied, the latter had a great advantage because of the lower cost of production. In consequence agriculture in the east entered upon a decline from which it has not yet recovered. Under free trade in Canadian farm products, western Canada, with its vast area of cheap land and virgin soil, would occupy relative to the west the position occupied forty years ago by the west relative to the east. The cost of production being much less in western Canada, the advantage in competition would be transferred to that region. If there had been a protective tariff sheltering eastern agriculture against western competition, the farmers of the east would have been able to hold their own. Lacking that protection they went down. Beyond question it has been a good thing for the west that no tariff wall sheltered the east against western competition, and beyond question also it will be a good thing for western Canada if the tariff wall between Canada and the United States shall be broken down. But for which country is the congress of the United States legislating? Is it for Canada or for the United States?—Denver Republican.
