THE JUDICIAL TEMPERAMENT

Early rising is a good thing, maybe, but the regular star light old fashioned early rising had its drawbacks in some lines. For instance, it used to delay a pig three years in getting its growth; now they grow a 300 pound hog in eight months. You see, the farmers were up at all hours of the night, pattering around, turning grindstones and clanking chain harness, so that all this racket kept the pigs awake and gave them nervous prostration so that they lost weight instead of putting on flesh, and grew thinner and more excitable every day. Of late years, since up-to-date farmers have learned to stay in bed until daylight, the pigs get so much more sleep that they grow fat and gouty and develop a judicial temperament and a policy of "we're prosperous, don't disturb us," and consequently are ready for slaughter by the time their first term is over.—L. Jean.
