MARY CHANGES HER MIND

By LOUISE OLIVER.

As the train pulled into Meridian, Jack Painter's thoughts were also finishing a long journey of retrospection, a period covering five years, the exact time he had been away from home.

The thoughts had much to do with a girl, a girl whose picture fitted in the back of his new five-hundred-dollar watch. When he had left Meridian the photograph had adorned the case of a one-dollar watch. Thus had Jack's fortunes changed and he was wondering whether or not the change was a good one for him, and he was doubtful about the wisdom of telling of his luck.

To be plain, Mary had said she loved him but had refused to marry him until he made some money.

"Yes, Jack, I do love you and I'm willing to marry you—but not now," she had said.

"Why?" he insisted.

"Because you can't keep me very well."

"I'd like to know if I can't. I've a bully good place in Reedem's office, and when he dies all the law business will come to me."

"That's a long time ahead. And, anyhow, old Mr. Reedem never made much. Why, his wife has done all her own work always. And, look at her—what a plain little mouse of a woman she is with all the spunk that was in her knocked out."

"You don't love me!"

"I do. I love you so well I don't want to learn to hate you because I'm played out, and I don't want you to begin to despise me because I've lost my looks and spirit."

He thought it over, then took his savings out of the bank, said good-by to Mary and left town.

The train slowed down and stopped. "By Jove, I'll do it!" Jack had thought over a plan of finding out a few things for himself.

He took a bus to the Commercial hotel, the poorest and cheapest of the three hostleries in the town, and breathed with relief when he found the lobby empty save for old man Stebbins himself.

"Hello, there! Bless my heart if it ain't Jack Painter. And look how he's all lit up. Heard you struck it rich, Jack?"

"Sh!" Jack put a hand to his lips. "Give me a roo'n, Stebbins, will you, and come up; I want to have a talk."

And after a while the old man came down and telephoned for Steve Lovell. Steve came around, went up to Jack's room and before long came down with a big fat check in his pocket.

That day Mary Fielding was reading in the lawn swing when Polly Marshall drove up the walk and ran in excitedly.

"Oh, Mary, have you heard the news? Jack Painter's home and he's working in old Mr. Reedem's office again. It's all a mistake about his getting along so well and I guess he's glad to get back. Mercy! What's wrong, Maze? You look like a ghost. There wasn't anything serious, was there, between you and Jack?"

"No—oh, no! I'm not feeling very well, that's all, Polly."

"And that's not all the news?" declared the gossip with importance and meaning. "Maybe you'll be more interested in this, since you've been seeing so much of Steve. Some lady died and left him heaps of money."

Polly left, but Mary sat silent and thoughtful.

She waited two days, but he neither came nor called up. The third morning she walked past the dingy old law office; and as luck had it, Jack was just leaving for Lee.

"Hello, Mary! Gee, I'm glad to see you!" he held out his hand.

"You seem to be. Have you forgotten where I live?"

"No, but—well, you see I didn't think I'd be welcome."

"You used to be, didn't you?"

"Yes, but I didn't know how things were. Besides I—I've come back poor, Mary."

"Oh, well," pretending not to get his meaning, "you're just in style in this town. Come anyway."

He looked down at his shabby clothes. "All right. But maybe I'll run into Steve."

"No, you'll not run into Steve." "But he inherited a fortune?" "I don't care. I told him not to come any more."

They had walked unconsciously to the end of the street and were on the road to the river.

We Deliver Coal When Promised

We are especially proud of one thing—our prompt deliveries. We fill orders, large and small, QUICKLY.

As a rule, people wait until there is but a few shovels full of coal left, then they want coal in a hurry.

Many families have been kept warm this winter because we supplied coal in a hurry and they know and appreciate our service.

HARRIS GEBO and KOOI

—are of the best the mines produce. This time buy the long-burning kinds that stand the test.
