

A Gentleman Fairy

By EDNA DEANE LYALL

Where all the children came from Rodney Marsh could not comprehend! It seemed as if magically quick some telepathic signal had been conveyed to every juvenile in the vicinity of the great tenement row where he had paused to watch a little group make mud pies. They wore soiled, ragged garments, were barefooted, and with pity and interest the kindly faced young man studied these poor and neglected, but happy children of the city.

Marsh drew out some small change and dropped as many coins among the four urchins who were engrossed in their mock pastry task. There was a scramble, a rapturous yell, a babel of voices from doorways and alleys. Then poured into the center children from far and near. They surrounded Marsh with grimed hands, extended and eloquent pleas for consideration.

"That is all," announced Marsh, as he detected specious repeaters in evidence and started away.

Only one of the throng ran after him, breathless and big eyed. He noticed that she was of a different brood to the general mass, being clean, poorly, but neatly dressed, and with a winning personality.

"Oh, mister, please!" uttered the little six-year-old miss. "Are you really throwing away money?"

"Why, yes, my dear, to good little children, and I am sure you must be that."

"Mamma says so, and Auntie Phyllis," came the prompt response. "Oh, how rich you must be! But I know—you're a gentleman fairy! You see, I've been saving up to buy the big doll down at the corner. Come along and I'll show you," and the little one took his hand with a trustfulness that caused him to thrill with pleasure.

She halted finally beside a show window full of toys and pointed with enraptured ecstasy at the object of her admiration.

It was marked two dollars. Marsh took out a banknote.

"Oh! does it take all that money?" cried Edith Waldron. "Please, Mr. Fairy, I can do without the doll, and I'd rather you'd buy an invalid chair for poor sick mamma."

"You sweet, self-sacrificing little cherub. You shall have the doll first, and then we will see about the invalid chair," said Marsh, and his companion hugging and chatting to her coveted acquaintance, they went back towards the tenement row.

"There's where we live," little Edith enlightened Marsh, and she pointed to a third story window. There was a box filled with flowering plants. The windows were clean and bright and adorned with snowy white curtains. "My papa is dead, and we are very poor, and Auntie Phyllis is nursing poor mamma, and she can't get about, and if any of your fairies have an invalid chair, won't you please send her one?"

"Indeed, I will!" pledged Marsh, and within the hour an invalid's wheeled chair was on its way to the old tenement. It had been a relief to mingle with the lowly and make at least a few humble ones happy, but now Marsh's own troubles filled his thoughts. He had come to the city to defend a lawsuit which, if it went against him, would mean the loss of nearly all he possessed. He knew that the claim against him was unjust, but it was in the hands of legal vampires.

Marsh located the rooms on the third floor. He knocked at an open door, noting the neatness of the place. A woman, pale and careworn, seated in a new invalid chair, greeted him.

"I understand that Miss Worth does copying at home," spoke Marsh, "and I have some work for her if she is not too busy."

"My sister will return in a few minutes. Won't you be seated, please?" said the invalid.

Marsh sat down in a chair near a typewriter. Upon a table lay a number of typed sheets. He could not help but notice them. As Mrs. Waldron wheeled herself into an adjoining room Marsh picked up one and then another of the sheets, deeply absorbed.

"It is fate!" he whispered, quite aroused, to himself, for by some strange coincidence Miss Worth had been copying the papers of the opposing counsel in his lawsuit. His face lightened as he became fully aware of the testimony and witnesses to be present, made some hurried notes and now knew what points to guard in the litigation.

Bright voices and footsteps sounded outside and Marsh arose to face a young girl twenty and a child of six, bearing in her loving clasp the famous doll of the corner store.

"Oh, Auntie Phyllis!" cried Edith ecstatically, rushing towards Marsh and throwing her arms about his neck. "It's the gentleman fairy!"

Marsh blundered through his equivocal mission as best he might. He said nothing when Miss Worth discovered his identity and insisted that as she could he should be repaid for the cherished invalid chair. It was destined to become a family possession, however, for the day Marsh won his case he asked gentle, faithful Phyllis Worth to become his wife.

GOLD MEDAL Haarlem Oil is included in odorless, tasteless capsules containing about 3 drops each. Take them as you would a pill, with a small swallow of water.
