There was once a wise parrot who diagnosed the cause of his trouble without much difficulty. Governor McKelvie would do well to pattern after this bird. The governor put his foot in it during his short stay in Chicago. He told somebody that it was easy for a stranger to buy space in Chicago and went so far as to say that policemen had offered to procure it for him. It got into the papers, and naturally the Chicago police chief and others in the Windy City objected. For a time, Little Mac was disposed to bluff it through, but he finally weakened after staying for two or three days, and admitted that he said it, and that he had no facts upon which to base his assertions. His retraction was full and complete and eminently satisfying to the outraged dignity of the Chicago police chief. It seems that Little Mac was only "joking," and that he didn't understand that it was to be printed. He didn't imagine that his words carried any particular weight. Why should the state of Nebraska be made ridiculous through the buffoonery of its chief executive? And wouldn't Mac howl if some eastern politician should make slighting remarks about Gus Hyatt?

The Herald is now receiving lines of publicity stuff from the headquarters of Governor Cox of Ohio, who yearns to be made the democratic nominee for the presidency. His friends insist that he is an idealist, and "will insist on a platform that is clear, simple and enlightened on such issues as free speech, industrial relations, protection, the high cost of living, the railroads and American shipping, federal budget system, and a system of national defense and preparedness American in spirit as well as in name." Inasmuch as the platform is written and adopted before the candidate is selected, it is questionable whether Governor Cox will be able to do all this. It is noteworthy, also, that the Governor keeps mum on the question of the league of nations and reservations. Let's be frank, and admit that the United States doesn't need another idealist in the executive chair, unless it knows something of his ideals.

McAdoo has announced that he will not permit his name to go before the democratic national convention. He is a comparatively poor man and cannot afford the expense the campaign would entail. His family is the first consideration with him, and he refuses to go gallivanting after a nomination or an election when they need the money. He does not say so, but it is likely that he will not refuse to make the race if nominated. The republican press seems to fear this, as does a good portion of the democratic press. We trust that Mr. McAdoo's wishes will be given every consideration.

The nomination of Warren G. Harding by the republicans has failed to arouse any great enthusiasm, outside of Ohio, his home state. It is especially distasteful to every element but the conservative. If the democrats show ordinary horse sense in selecting a candidate, all is not lost yet, although before the republican convention the average democrat would have sold the party's chances for a sick dime.

The national convention, for the time being, have put state politics in the shade. John M. Morehead is busy building up political fences, and Governor McKelvie is not letting the grass accumulate under his feet. His last publicity trick, aside from his fake report of Chicago bootlegging operations, was to write to all the convicts in one of the state road camps and then give the replies to the press for publication. Strangely enough, all of them commended him for his stand in keeping these camps going despite the escape of several prisoners. The honor system, when applied to those whose lack of honor has been pronounced, is, indeed, a splendid idea.

There has been an attempt on the life of ex-Kaiser Wilhelm, by a German. Yet some people talk of trying this man in the courts and giving him regular sentence. How much more fitting is his present punishment, in seclusion, fearing every man about him and wondering which will be the one to stick a knife between his ribs. Some day one of those Germans, whose war losses has brought back his reason, will be successful. The ex-kaiser might be a comparatively safe in a jail or exiled to a St. Helena.
