In all human probability we shall next winter see a congestion of railroad traffic worse than we had last winter, because the railroads will then be no better prepared to handle traffic than they are now. The cannot get ready before next fall for the large increase in business. Everything which can be handled this summer should be transported at the earliest moment possible. Every private family and every factory which can stock up with coal during the summer should do so. With a steady demand from all coal consumers with a view to supplying next winter's needs, the mines could be kept in regular operation during the summer and the railroads, hampered as they are, would in all probability be able to handle, says Manufacturers' Record. Anyone who puts off buying his supply of coal until next winter is taking a great risk of getting none.
