A MATTER OF CHOICE

By ALVAH J. GARTH

(Copyright, 1920, Western Newspaper Union)

"My choice," said Robert Wayne "is travel. My ambition is to see the world."

"Action is what I wish to experience," spoke Bert Haywood, "business society, politics, and such so that I gain a training that fits me for my final mission in life."

"Adventure for me!" chirped Aleck Martin doughtily. "Battle, wild animals; aviation, fighting outlaws or trailing animals. The daring and thrilling is my forte."

And then Reuben Merle and the three who had spoken looked at Clifton Bros inquiringly.

"Come, speak up, Clifton!" ordered bluff, hearty Reuben Merle. "How do your inclinations run?"

"I can say it in a word," came the careful measured reply, "education," and the old man looked impressed, the others amused.

"As if six years in college hadn't given you a surfeit of that," jeered Martin.

"Well, I wish to use it in a practical way out in the world," supplemented Bros.

"Take your fling, lads," broke in Merle. "You have the time to demonstrate your various preferences. Then come back and settle down, and there's room enough and money in this lonely old house for all of you—and four pretty, cheery wives in the bargain, if you choose!"

"He was a quaint old fellow, this Reuben Merle, and he had been like an own father to the quartette of lads he had adopted from an orphan asylum eight years previous and developed into manly, intelligent young fellows. He had now started them out on an "independent test," as he called it.

"Come back satisfied; that is all I ask," he told them, and although he missed them from the first he consoled himself by philosophizing that a few months "on their own hook" would vastly expand their ideas.

It was three months to a day when Robert Wayne one morning burst in upon Merle with a hearty handshake and a cheery note of gladness.

one arm in a sling, and fussed. "Adventure," he explained briefly "I got it in a mining camp when a joyful cowboy flung a bowie knife at that cheek. A playful encounter with a grizzly did the rest."

"Wonder what has become of Clifton Bros and his quest for practical education?" more than once suggested Merle, and one day he walked in. Whereas, he had been naturally pale and slight looking, he was now bronzed and husky. He greeted all hands with a new self-assurance that bespoke success, or at least satisfaction.

"All here?" he commented in a pleased way. "Good! I have solved the problem of practical education. I am pleased to say, I have always maintained, you know, that a man may be a gentleman farmer, or a scientific carpenter, if he has the brains. Fellows, I've learned more about agriculture in eight months than I could have acquired by study in as many years. Dear old patron, friend, and adopted father! I have come back to ask you to put me in charge of the farm here."

"Well! well!" commented Merle in a gratified way. "How did you come to take up the plowshare and harvest-ery?"

"Well, it was fate," responded Clifton. "I fell sick near a farmhouse. Kind people took me in. A kinder daughter nursed me. Love and farming, see?"

"And—the young lady in question?" ventured Merle.

"Oh, Rosa, my wife, you mean?" inquired Clifton, placidly and proudly. "I left her at the hotel here, until I learned if my report met with your approval."

"Lad," spoke Reuben Merle, his face aglow, "she shall reign here as the cherished queen of our little household!"
