THE OFFICE BOYS' OFF-HOUR
The New York Sun reports that of 1,728 office boys whose lives were laid open to the investigation of a self-appointed committee of efficiency experts, it was determined:

Twelve per cent read "dime" novels; seventeen print their names over seventy times daily; eleven watch the door from the hall, where they pitch pennies; three collect stamps; seven practice typing "The large brown fox jumped over the lazy dog"; four sleep; three sit and think; six sit.

The remaining thirty-five per cent is sufficiently clever in its action so that even their bosses don't know what they do.

"True womanhood will shine," writes a poetess. Not if the powder puff can prevent it.

In London they are going to extend daylight saving. Here, we have forgotten we ever had it.

It may seem an impossible thing that an impossible man can secure membership of a decent club, yet such instances have occurred. Such an impossible person approached the secretary of his club. "I want your advice, sir," he said. "I have been deliberately insulted by one of the members. I was sitting in the smoking-room, when Colonel — came up to me and said, without preamble, 'Sir, I will give you one hundred pounds if you will resign your membership of this club.' Now, what ought I to do in the matter?"
"It's perfectly obvious, sir," said the relieved secretary, with alacrity. "Hold on for a better offer."—Tattler (London.)
