Upward Through Different Stages

When man first stopped living in the open, and began to live in homes, he sought for a satisfactory means of heating his dwelling place. For thousands of years he was forced to use the open fire, and the equally unsatisfactory fire-place. It has fallen to the lot of the American people to play an important part in developing the means of controlling nature's laws to be of service to mankind.

When Columbus discovered America, all humanity was still using the open fire and the fire-place. The Indian used the campfire, and marveled at the fire-place and Dutch oven used by the white man. The early colonists were forced to be content with this unsatisfactory means of heating as there was no other means to be had.

The greatest advance step in heating came with the invention of the stove in the eighteenth century; the stove being an American invention, and was the first at-tempt to confine the fire in a closed space. From the stove to the hot air furnace was only a short step, and shows the cleverness of American ingenuity. But the hot air furnace proved unsatisfactory in many respects, and human inventive genius again started out to find some other medium of conveying the heat from the point where it was produced to the place where it was used. un miler alles LEP

At this time steam engineering practice had advanced to the point where its principles were becoming generally known, and it was only natural that men took to steam as a means of heating.
