Suggest Changes in United States Potato Grades

Proposed changes in the United States potato grades to go into effect June 15 or July 1, have been submitted for consideration to 400 of the principal factors in the potato industry by the United States Department of Agriculture. The suggest changes contemplate the elimination from United States No. 1 of badly misshaped potatoes and potatoes affected by hollow heart, and the addition of a grade to be known as United States No. 1 Small. There appears to be a widespread demand in the potato industry for those modifications.

The principal reasons advanced for the proposed changes are given by the Department of Agriculture as follows:

Hollow heart is universally conceded to be a serious defect which should be eliminated from the United States No. 1 grade and the revised grade simply places official approval upon common commercial practice. For the past year or two it has been the practice to consider hollow heart as not affecting the grade, but, in spite of this policy, the inclusion of such stock has caused large numbers of rejections which necessitated allowances. The only argument in favor of admitting hollow heart stock to United States No. 1 grade has been based on the difficulty of discovering the defect. It is believed that this is not a sufficient reason for continuing the old policy for, unless United States No. 1 potatoes are recognized as being free from serious internal defects, the grade is bound to fall into disrepute.

Badly misshaped potatoes also injure the appearance of the product and cause excessive waste. Since their undesirability is generally recognized, the department believes that they should be excluded from United States No. 1 grade just as potatoes damaged by deep scab, growth cracks or grub injury are excluded for the same reason. Many growers and shippers are culling out such stock at the present time.

United States No. 1 Small will provide a grade for potatoes which are of good market quality, but too small to grade United States No. 1. During the movement of early potatoes from the southern states and to a lesser extent from some of the late producing states, two sizes of potatoes are frequently shipped as follows: Stock above 1¾ or 1⅞ inches, respectively, the United States No. 1 minimum sizes for long and round stock, and stock between these sizes and 1½ inches in diameter. In the past this small stock has been sold as United States No. 2, but as this grade also includes large stock which varies widely from this standard of market quality, an additional grade is deemed necessary for the sake of clearness. Such a grade is already provided by several state departments of agriculture.

It is the intention to recommend the revised grades for the old ones at some definite early date, perhaps June 15 or July 1.
