The disease is usually contracted through wounds from rusty nails, etc., which have been in such soil and are covered by the germs, or it may come from direct contact between an abraded skin surface and earth containing the germs. One of the characteristics of these bacteria, and a fortunate one, is that they cannot propagate in the presence of oxygen. Were it not for this fact the disease would certainly be much more common. "Among the first to investigate along this line in this country was Dr. George W. Hopkins, bacteriologist to the Cleveland Medical college. Dr. Hopkins secured a strong, vigorous goat and injected into it at first one-one-millionth of a increasing doses for four months, the last dose being five drops of a most virulent culture, and at the end of this time the animal's jegular vein was opened and two quarts of rich red blood were extracted. This was allowed to coagulate and then the serum which had been squeezed out of the clot was removed. This possessed the curative properties, and with it many experiments were performed. Rabbits, guinea pigs and dogs were inoculated with the disease, and when it had assumed an apparently fatal form a few drops of the antitoxine serum were introduced under the animal's skin and this procedure was invariably followed by muscular relaxation and general improvement in a few hours and complete recovery as a rule inside of 24 hours. It was later tried upon horses suffering from lockjaw with equally gratifying results and lastly in cases in men, with complete recovery in all but a few cases which were not seen until the patients were moribund."
