He says he saw many of them during the warm days, along the corn fields where the trash had accumulated, hopping around in the sun. There were literally thousands of them, and there were also immense numbers of unhatched eggs in their holes under the bunch grass. He says that skunks or badgers are after them, digging for their eggs in the dirt.

Omaha is rejoicing over what it thinks an assurance that the Union Pacific will build larger shops there the coming summer. It is said the company will spend a million dollars for the purpose.
