Two physicians are in attendance and every phase of his malady is closely watched. Inflamation has set in, but it is yet too early for the physicians to determine whether this is a mark of improvement or not. No operation will be attempted, at least as long as the patient remains as weak as he is at present. The only result feared is that blood poisoning may set in and if that should occur, it is doubtful that Mr. Crane could recover. Opiates are administered now to relieve the pain and under this influence Mr. Crane was resting easily when the Hub called to-
