A New Stunt.
 The residents of this city were greeted at every turn Saturday morning by the mysterious legend, "Watch the Red Moon Rise." It peered from windows, smiled from fences and buildings, hung from door knobs, telephone poles, tacks and wires, stared up from sidewalks, and seemed to be everywhere. This was all done some time after midnight and we are informed that a mysterious stranger wearing a silk hat was seen moving about in the shadows with an armful of cards, at about 2 o'clock in the morning. Just what is meant by the phrase and all this mystery, no one is able to find out, as the visitors or local practical jokers whoever they may be, confided in none. Several local people have attempted to fathom the mystery, but have given it up and guessed everything from a road show to a new patent medicine. It bears some of the ear marks of a local practical joke, as the man who was seen, in the night, when asked what he was doing, retreated into the shadows and intoned exuberantly, "Watch the Red Moon Rise." Either he didn't know, or he wouldn't tell.

Clyde Trotter, of Brady, spent the week end in town on business.

One of the interesting addresses made at the State Irrigation Convention, held at Bridgeport on the 14th and 15th was made by Senator W. V. Hoagland. The address dealt with the difficulty in securing the passage of Irrigation Legislation, and urged upon people interested to get together, decide on what legislation was desired, and have the bills prepared to be introduced upon the first day possible to introduce bills. Another proposition discussed was the fact that of the state officers, the commissioner of Public Lands & Buildings, had more to do with irrigation than any other, and Senator Hoagland urged the people in western Nebraska, to lay aside politics and unite as men who would take a determined stand in favor of the interests of irrigation and other interests in the western part of the state. The address created a decided sentiment in favor of independent political action in the convention.
