Robert Patterson Dies.

Mayor Patterson went to Denver Sunday afternoon, to which city he was called by the death of his brother Robert Patterson. The deceased was a former resident of North Platte, having served his apprenticeship as a machinist and remained for some time after completing his time. He went to Colorado in 1877 and had since made that state his home. He patented a battery drill for mining, and at the time of his death was superintendent of the factory making the drills.

Former North Platte Boy Suicides.

A Salida, Col., special to the Denver Post of March 8th, contains an account of the suicide of Warren Davis, a son of Milledge Davis, a former North Platte resident, but who has lived in Colorado since early boyhood. The young man, who was twenty-eight years of age, was employed as registry clerk in the Salida postoffice, and was charged with taking a registered package containing $5,000, which was enroute from Pueblo to Oury and which passed through the Salida office. While the finger of guilt pointed strongly toward him, he protested his innocence, and following his death seven letters were found addressed to friends in which he declared he was not guilty of the charge.

Death ensued from a bullet which he sent through his brain, holding the muzzle of the revolver in his mouth.

Miss Hazel Deane, with whom the dead man had been intimate for several years, upon learning of the suicide, attempted to take her own life. She entered a saloon, called for a drink of whisky to steady her nerves, then pulled a gun and attempted to shoot herself, but the gun was wrested from her by a bystander.
