Round House or Depot, Which?

President Mohler, of the Union Pacific, made good his promise to meet the business men of North Platte Saturday and talk over the depot situation, but he departed without leaving us in exuberant spirits over the prospects of a new depot in the near future. About 100 prominent citizens assembled at the Elks' home at eight o'clock, and shortly thereafter President Seeberger, of the Chamber of Commerce, called the meeting to order and spoke of the correspondence had with Mr. Mohler and as a result of that correspondence Mr. Mohler was with us. He then called on Mayor Patterson, who said that during his forty-four years' residence in North Platte he had observed that when the Union Pacific was prosperous North Platte was prosperous and vice versa. He remembered when six months elapsed between the visits of the pay car, and then again he had known it to visit North Platte twice a month. His great ambition was to see this city prosper and hoped to have a nice depot here in the future.

Upon being introduced, Mr. Mohler said he agreed with everything that had been said in the past about the North Platte depot—it is inadequate, unsightly and unsanitary, and a new depot was certainly needed. A couple of years ago he had recommended an appropriation for that purpose, but the men higher up had said nay. One hundred and fifty million dollars had been spent in rebuilding the Union Pacific and millions were yet needed to complete the double tracking and in making terminal improvements. This work had to be done if the road was to hold its business, otherwise competing lines would get the business. All available funds had therefore been devoted to this purpose, and needed depots and other improvements were relegated to the rear. The double-tracking and the consequent increase of business on the road had directly helped North Platte; it created a greater pay-roll. Today the Union Pacific pays out $76,000 each month at North Platte, it employs 1,000 people here and over 2,000 North Platte residents get their living directly from the Union Pacific. He had placed in the budget an appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars for terminal improvements at North Platte, which included a new round house, greater trackage, new coal shutes and other improvements. If we demanded a new depot, the terminal improvements could not be made; which did we want, the new round house or the new depot? Interrogated as to whether these terminal improvements would be made in the near future, Mr. Mohler said they would be pushed forward as fast as possible—which of course is indefinite. In closing Mr. Mohler referred to the strike, saying that prior to October 1st the Union Pacific had the best shophmen of any road in the country; they had made demands, however, that could not be met by the company, and the walk out resulted. The company could not recede from the position it had taken. In view of the money paid out by the company to its employes and as taxes, he believed it was entitled to protection—meaning by this that the strike-breakers should receive the protection afforded other residents. After the meeting adjourned many of those present met Mr. Mohler and a half hour was spent in informal conversation.
