Wallace has a sensation of the black mail type. A well known resident rented one of his buildings to a man and wife to conduct a restaurant. One day recently the man purchased a ticket for an adjoining town and got on the train. The woman invited her landlord into the restaurant, drank a cup of tea with him, and then suggested that he fix over the room in which she and her husband slept. He demurred to this, but finally the woman persuaded him to enter the bedroom to see its condition, and while there the husband appeared, drew a wicked looking gun, and accusing his wife of infidelity, demanded that the landlord fork over $500. The landlord refused to submit to the blackmail and edged out of the room. The husband had gotten on the train, but after it was in motion jumped off on the opposite side from the depot and remained in hiding until he was satisfied his wife had the landlord ensnared.
