A Case of "Making Good."

A Chicago judge had before him a 13-year-old boy convicted of grabbing a pocketbook from a woman in the street. It was an aggravated case, but the judge hesitated on account of the boy's tender years. Calling to the boy's mother he said:

"Pronounce sentence upon this boy!"

The mother did not shrink from the task. She said: "You must earn the money to pay for what you stole. You must promise to be in bed every night by 9 o'clock or I will ask the judge to send you away until your hair grows gray." The judge confirmed the sentence. The mother was wiser than many judges, far wiser than the Georgia judge who sentenced a boy to 11 years in a reformatory for stealing a bottle of pop.

Restitution is the first and ideal form of punishment. It is the real way to make the punishment fit the crime, to bring home to the offender the measure of his offense.

By the time that boy has worked and saved to restore the stolen money he will have gained a new idea of the rights of others in their property. Then this mother's sentence provided the proper accompaniment to punishment—reformation, in bed at 9 o'clock every night!

What a world of protection for the child in that simple rule! How it erects a bar against temptation, evil associations and the forming of bad habits! How it teaches regularity and temperance and promotes moral and physical health! This sentence embodying restitution and reform, enforced by parental and judicial authority, should be all that is necessary for any child that has strayed into paths of crime.—Sioux City Tribune.
