When the Worm Turned

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.

In this instance the worm was Sarah Ann Perkins of the village of Smithville.

Nature and her father and a lot of other persons and things were to blame for it, and the turning of that worm made a heap of trouble for a hundred people or more.

Sarah Ann was born homely. Just how homely she was as a baby need not be told here. She was homely as a small girl, and everybody knows how the homely business goes when it once gets started. At the age of twenty Sarah Ann was a peach. She attracted tea times the attention of any handsome girl.

Sarah Ann's father was to blame in this way. He was an easy mark during his life, and when he came to his dying bed he made a will leaving everything to his daughter.

It got noised around that Sarah Ann had been left a big legacy, and widowers and bachelors appeared and fell in love with her. Then they investigated the legacy matter and fell out again. When Miss Perkins had reached the age of forty, which she did in due time, the five or six women in Smithville that were keeping book accounts against her figured up that she had been flitted twenty-two different times. Trust the married women of a village to keep tabs on an old maid.

There was great jeering when the last flit came. Sarah Ann wept and was not comforted. She realized that her last chance had slipped away. Even an optimistic woman can't fail to realize that there must be an end to the courting game. For a long, long day our heroine was thinking, and when the stars of evening twinkled again her mind was made up. The village of Smithville hadn't given her a fair show. The worm would turn and make it hot for Smithville. There was no one around to hear the click of the spinster's teeth as her mind was made up with the rock of Gibraltar for a foundation. If there had been there would have been shivers a-plenty.

Two weeks from that night Sarah Ann Perkins disappeared off the face of the earth—that is, the face of the earth around Smithville. She had been living alone with her cat in a little cottage. A window was found broken in and a door broken open. Chairs were upset and furniture broken, and there were splashes of blood here and there.

There was great excitement at once. Miss Perkins had been murdered while the village slept. The body could not be found. More than a hundred people turned out and spent the day looking for it, but not the slightest trace was had. The sheriff and the coroner overhauled the missing woman's papers, and the first document was a solar plexus blow. It charged thirty different villagers with conspiracy to do away with the writer by violence. The list included a minister, an elder and two deacons, and the others were women. About half were women. The charge was boldly made that on certain dates certain men or women had called at the old maid's house or met her on the street and warned her that she must leave the town or have her throat cut.

The production of this document filled the village with consternation. The sheriff decided that he must make arrests as charged, and he went about it. Meanwhile the search for the body continued, and strangers came from twenty miles away to participate. Newspapers sent their representatives, and private detectives were on hand by the dozen. There might not have been a hundred different theories, but there surely were fifty.

The number of persons arrested was 103; the number of strangers visiting Smithville in the first four weeks was estimated at 10,700; the number of newspaper columns written was 550; the number of times Sarah Ann's picture was used was 84; the damage to the business of the town was $20,000.

Of the 103 persons arrested all but two proved alibis for the night of the murder. Of the other two one was a merchant and the other a deacon. They had played checkers and drunk hard cider in a back room of the store that night until they had slid out of their chairs and slept under the table. Time consumed in the trial, five weeks; cost to county and individuals, $14,000. No one was convicted.

Of course it was Sarah Ann Perkins who broke open her door and smashed in the window. The blood came from a chicken killed that afternoon. She left her cottage at about 8 o'clock and had the luck to get out of the village unseen. Then she took to the highway and traveled all night and made fifty miles next day by the cars. Then she halted and bired out at a village inn and was within sixty-five miles of Smithville all the time the affair was on. Three thousand dollars was the reward out for her, but no one got it.

One day a year later Sarah Ann reappeared in Smithville. She was accompanied by her husband. He was the innkeeper she had worked for. She had finally told him her story, and when it had been concluded he had asked:

"But what was the matter you couldn't get married?"
"Too homely," she replied.
"Why, dura my cats, but you are one of the best looking women I ever saw! What in thunder could have ailed those twenty-two fellows? Blamed handsome woman and a heroine to boot! Let's go and get married as soon as we can!"
