As an Exchange Grows the Operating Expense of Each Telephone Increases

As the number of telephones in an exchange increases, the value of the service to each subscriber is enlarged.

Two connected telephones would permit each subscriber to talk to but one other.

Six connected telephones would permit each to talk to five others—giving five times the service to each subscriber and necessitating five times the operating labor for each telephone.

Thus, in a given ratio, the value of the service to each subscriber increases as the number of telephones increase; and the operating expense of each telephone in the exchange increases in like proportion.

This is one reason why telephone service always costs more in the large towns.
