As many as a dozen hoboes per day apply at the jail for lodging and as warm weather approaches the number seems to be increasing. The majority of these fellows are impertinent and seem to think the world owes them a living regardless of any effort on their part to earn it. The city authorities consider the condition as serious, and some solution must be reached. Working the 'boes on the streets is regarded as the most plausible plan, and yet this is not satisfactory. However, if it was generally known up and down the road that hoboes were corralled and made to work in North Platte, it would have a tendency to have them steer clear of the town.
