

A Double Mistake

By SARAH BAXTER

"Mr. Popenjoy!" announced a maid in a black uniform, white apron and dainty cap to Miss Angela Rivers, who was standing before a mirror in her dressing room.

"Tell him I'll be down directly." The visit was not unexpected. Miss Rivers' mother, a widow, had some time before written her daughter that she had decided to marry again; that her fiancé was not by any means an old man, but full of life and spirits. It would be useful to them both. His name was Roger Popenjoy, and he was quite well off. The mother, who was not given to long letters, deemed this quite a sufficient explanation for the present and closed by saying that Mr. Popenjoy would be in the city very day to make the daughter's acquaintance.

When her toilet had been satisfactorily arranged Miss Rivers went downstairs to meet her future stepfather. She was surprised to see a man about thirty years old and with all the airs and graces of a man of the world. Her mother was only forty, but Angela never dreamed that she would marry a man ten years younger than herself. However, good breeding required that she show neither surprise, disappointment nor any other emotion. She advanced, extending her hand graciously.

"Mamma wrote me that you would call today."

"Indeed, I expected to call soon, but I was not aware that there was any special appointment as to the date."

"Have you been in the city long?"

"Oh, yes, I live here."

Miss Rivers was surprised at this. She supposed that her mother had met her second fate in the city where she was visiting. The young lady would have liked to ask how long he had lived in the city of her home and why she had not met him in society, but this would have been to imply that he was not of the select social circle, the social circle to which the Riverses belonged.

"I've been living here only a month," he said. "I came here to go into business."

"In so short a time you could not have made many acquaintances. I shall have the pleasure of introducing you to some of my friends."

"Thank you very much."

"Of course, considering the relationship, we shall have a great deal of freedom in going about together. We won't need a chaperon."

"Not at all."

"Only I wouldn't like mother to be jealous." This was said archly and with a smile.

"I'm more afraid of father as to that."

"Father?"

"Yes, father," looking at her with surprise.

"How old is your father?"

"How old is my father? Haven't you been told how old he is? Why, he's fifty-five."

"I confess I haven't heard anything about him."

"That's singular. I should have thought he would have told you everything."

"I haven't ever seen him."

The young man looked at her with opening eyes.

"What kind of a match do you call this, anyway?" he asked presently.

"I think it a very good match. So long as mamma is pleased I am."

"Oh, your mother's consent was necessary. Of course it was. How stupid of me!"

Wearing Flowers.

The kind of flowers that are fitting for a woman to wear depends upon her age and personal appearance. Blossoms that are becoming to a young girl look out of place on the elderly woman, and the woman who is tall can wear certain varieties which the one who is short cannot.

Banksia roses are for the quite young girl. Violets are charming for either youth or age. Daisies belong only to youth. Pansies seem fitted for riper age, though the pansy-eyed girl looks well with them. Chrysanthemums look well on youth or maturity, but do not seem to belong to the old. Roses belong to all ages, but need to be chosen with care as to their color and size. Lilies can only be worn by a tall figure. Neither are poppies for the petite nor things that grow in branch form. Snowdrops that would look foolish on a middle aged woman look sweet on a young girl. Lilies of the valley are for youth or middle age. Mignonette does not belong to youth, nor do sweet peas and daffodils belong to age, but any one can wear the fragrant carnation.—Exchange.

Unmoral and Immoral.

Are you unmoral or immoral? Do not answer too quickly, for if you are only unmoral you may be able to overlook it. Unmoral stands to immoral in much the same relation as unregenerate stands to degenerate. If you commit some act of which the arbiters of ethics disapprove the category that you go in all depends on whether the arbiters have previously brought the ethical constitution and bylaws to your notice. If they have already told you that a certain thou shalt not exists then you are immoral if you disobey it. If, however, you are still in an untaught state of sheer savagery then you are merely unmoral, and instead of being the victim of execration and contumely you are entitled to all the emoluments and perquisites of any other savage. Ignorance of the civil or criminal laws excuses no one, but ignorance of the moral law does count for a little, those discriminate days.—Ellis O. Jones in Lippincott's.

Good Advertisement.

Father is an advertising man and has had the misfortune to be laid up with the rheumatism. For some time, when he has been able to walk at all, he has limped along at a snail's gait with a cane. Things seemed blue enough, but it was for his small son to point out that which, in the little boy's mind, was one of the large benefits of the situation.

They had walked down the street together, and dad had been stopped several times by people who wished to know what was the matter or to inquire how the disease was progressing. "Do you know, dad, this is some advertisement?" said the son enthusiastically.

"What is?" groaned his father.

"Being all crippled up and walking poky with a cane," replied the son. "I never did see so many people pay so much attention to you before."

Father was too stiff and sore to whip him.—Indianapolis News.

Memory.

Memory is that faculty of the mind which enables us to know that we have forgotten something. Without memory there would be no history; hence no fiction.

Memory furnishes the only background for liars that is needed. It enables many people to labor under the continuous illusion that there is a past, when in reality there is nothing but a present.

Without memory there would be no worry, because worry is fear for the future, based on recollection of what has happened—usually to someone else.

Memory enables us to store our minds with useful facts—until they are proved to be wrong by their useful facts which in turn take their place.—Life.

Lifting Dead Weight.

There is a more or less popular belief that it is easier to lift up a living body and carry it some distance than to carry a small, compact "dead" weight, such as iron dumbbells. Somebody several thousands of years before any art of writing was invented imagined this thing and told it to his next door man.

He told it and so all along the ages and centuries. Pure hallucination, along with hundreds of others now injuring this modern scientific age. If a person weighing 150 pounds appears lighter than anything weighing fifty or seventy-five pounds, it is simply because a distorted mind of some weak man imagined it, maybe 100,000 years ago. Same origin for all current myths.—New York American.

Didn't Give Her a Chance.

"After all, Clara, it is not such a serious matter if you quarreled with your fiancé. Remember, the wise one gives in."

"That's just it; he gave in almost immediately."—Munich Megendorfer Blatter.

Both Runners.

"I like athletics for girls. You ought to see how my daughter can run up a rope."

"And you ought to see how mine can run up a bill."—Baltimore American.

A Point Gained From an Impostor

By DWIGHT NORWOOD

I began my public career by writing books; but, although I became favorably known as an author, my income from my literary work was not large. I presume I wrote for the few whose taste is refined. I entered the lecture field and found the work much easier and far more productive.

After having lectured in the principal cities of the United States during several successive seasons I turned my attention to foreign lands. One of my books was of the popular kind and was published all over the world, being translated into five different languages. This gave me good audiences wherever I went, and my profits were correspondingly large.

Having made engagements to lecture in Australia, I took a steamer for Melbourne, but, owing to a break in the machinery of the vessel that bore me, did not arrive there till the day after the date announced for my lecture. On driving to my hotel I saw my name posted on the streets with the date of the lecture which had passed. I wondered what had been done about the matter.

On reaching my hotel the gentlemanly clerk swung the register around for me to enter my name, and I wrote Ambrose Pemberton in large, round letters with a flourish under the words, as was my habit. When the clerk wheeled the register back and read what I had written he looked up at me with a surprised expression on his face. I returned his gaze inquiringly, but he did not enlighten me as to the cause of his surprise. Calling a boy, he handed him a key and told him to show me to my room.

When I came down to dinner I took up an evening newspaper, and what was my astonishment to read a report of a lecture I had delivered the night before. Not only had I lectured, but I had made a profound impression on the audience.

It was evident that some one had been personating me. Either those whom I had instructed to make the necessary preparations for me—I had no regular manager at this time—had hired a man to give the lecture or some person had taken advantage of my name and, having all things at hand for the purpose, had personated me. Having eaten dinner hastily I went out into the general rotunda for guests and others wherein the office was situated intending to make inquiries as to the person who had lectured in my name. On the way I passed three men, one of whom was introducing the other two.

"Mr. Williams, this is Mr. Pemberton, who won us all by his lecture last night."

I sank into an easy chair near by and, pretending to read the newspaper I had in my hand, listened.

"I was one of your audience, Mr. Pemberton," said Mr. Williams, "and have to thank you for a very agreeable evening. Some years ago I heard a man of your name lecture in Hongkong. Is he a relative of yours?"

"That fellow is an impostor. He goes about in places where I am known by reputation, but not in person and, taking advantage of the reputation, draws an audience and pockets the proceeds." "I never heard of such a thing before. I should think he would be an injury to you. His lecture was a very dull affair, I assure you."

Interesting as was this dialogue to me, I confess my amour propre was at this point somewhat ruffled. I controlled myself, however, and continued to keep my ears open.

"As I remember the fellow's lecture, which was on the pyramids of Egypt, it was as dry as the sands of the desert. Yours, on the contrary, was as fresh as a meadow in springtime."

"I never go into those details that are interesting only to bookworms," replied "Mr. Pemberton."

This latter remark decided me as to whether or not I should expose this real impostor. I determined to use the advice he had given me and pay no attention to him. In fact, I was indebted to him for an excellent point. The dialogue had informed me of what I required. I had been a close student of the subjects upon which I lectured, but I had relied too closely upon the body of my discourse, the information I conveyed, paying no attention to those artful accessories upon which the successful orator relies to catch and hold the attention of an audience of average intelligence. Following "Mr. Pemberton," I accosted him:

"Beg pardon, sir, I believe you are Mr. Pemberton, the lecturer. May I ask when and where you will lecture again? I am desirous of hearing you."

"Next week at Sydney."

"I am going to Sydney. I shall hear you."

The man looked at me suspiciously, but I passed on without saying anything more. I was advertised to lecture at Sydney the next week and resolved to go there incognito. I did so and attended the man's lecture, for he played the same game as at Melbourne.

He knew very little about his subject—only what he could read up hastily—but was full of humor and excellent in the use of pathos. From him I learned to introduce a quantum of light material into my lectures and from that time forward felt that my audiences were better pleased with my efforts, which gave me confidence, and the result was in all respects admirable.
