A Tribute to Colonel W. F. Cody.

(By John E. Evans.)

Sunday evening an informal reception was tendered Col. W. F. Cody at the Elks' home by the B. P. O. E., of which he is a member. Many character sketches of the pioneer days were told and incidents of the early settlement of plains and mountain related. Stories of the days of the pony express, of freighting, and emigrant travel through a hostile Indian country, brought to our minds in a vivid way, the hardships and daring deeds of the pioneer.

Western Nebraska owes Col. Cody much. Every home on our vast plains is made secure and peaceful by the sagacity, the courage and the endurance of the officers and men who guarded the frontier and the foremost of these is Col. Cody. When he led the cavalry command on that famous seventy-mile ride, without rest or food, and when challenged, met in deadly combat the famous chief Yellow Hand, he did not do it for contest, for gold or for glory, but to prevent a junction of the Cheyenne braves with the hordes of Indians under command of Sitting Bull, which meant a long, bloody and destructive war which would have left desolate homes in all the country west of the Missouri river.

Col. Cody was the trusted friend, counselor and guide of General Sheridan, Miles, Crook, Carr and many others. He had the confidence, good will and esteem of men high in national and state government, and why? Because of his honesty, his energy and his ability to do great things.

His spacious home and large estate at North Platte were for years the gravitating center for men who have built up the west. In his varied career, he has hob-nobbed with the royalty of the foremost nations of the world, has contested the field with lords and drunk tea with the ladies—truly a man of varied attainments and wonderful resources.

In one of his many expeditions, he led a delegation of scientists into the Big Horn Basin, and while the professors prospected search for the bones of the mastodon, mineral deposits or the bugs of the mountains, Col. Cody saw the possibilities of the great Big Horn Basin, with its soil 21 feet deep; rich and productive; he saw the mountain streams with which to irrigate, and with foresighted vision he saw the great basin filled with settlers, prosperous and happy. Col. Cody never halts at obstacles. Picking the location, he built a $150,000 hotel at Cody; he induced the railroad to build across the mountains and thru the basin; by showing the government the scenic route, it built the finest wagon road in the world, 135 miles long, to the eastern entrance of the Yellowstone National Park. He built the first canal to irrigate the soil in the Big Horn Basin, and no doubt, largely influenced by the construction of this canal, the government has built a $3,000,000 dam across the Soshong river, creating a greater power than the Niagara and bringing the water into the rich productive soil, that he will yet see blossom like the rose.

From eastern Kansas, through Nebraska, Colorado and now in the heart of Wyoming, Col. Cody has blazed a trail, has built monuments that will stand as testimonials of his sagacity, his energy, his liberality and his honesty.

The members of the Elks and the many friends of his early life in North Platte are always glad to welcome Col. Cody to this city, which for so many years was his home.
