

A Mild Flirtation

By ALISON LES

(Copyright, 1919, by Western Newspaper Union.)

For fully twelve months Alvin Downey, bachelor, aged thirty-five, had been wooing Marcia Foster, six years his junior. She was an orderly, good-looking lady with some resources, was really attracted by the honest, open way in which he proffered his petition as a claimant to her hand, and was worth the winning of any sensible man.

"Give me time, Alvin," she had said. "I esteem you greatly, but I want to be sure that I shall not later regret an impulsive step."

So, meekly, patiently, Alvin Downey continued his semi-weekly calls until an invalid brother sent for him from a city a thousand miles away. Marcia told him she would miss him, and he went away feeling sanguine that absence would only make the heart fonder, and determined to bring affairs to a definite issue upon his return.

It was only after a dull week that Marcia began to appreciate the past companionship of Downey. She missed the auto rides, the weekly theater and movie shows. Then one day something transpired that broke the routine of her loneliness, and came very nearly wrecking the fond hopes of Alvin Downey.

She was seated on the veranda when a young man came up the rose-lined walk, removed his hat and made an obeisance that would have done credit to a Beau Brummel. He had dark, curly locks and "a love of a moustache," any impressionable young lady would have expressed it, bright, magnetic eyes and a most graceful bearing. He dashed all features of romance, however, by announcing that he had a polishing compound to sell.

Marcia listened patiently to his exordium as to the merits of his wares, and good-naturedly purchased a package of the polish. She went into the house to get her purse, and when she returned fancied he looked weary, invited him to a seat, doubled her original order and was quite touched by the appealing way in which the handsome fellow expressed his gratitude.

"It may be the hard times, or people generally don't want polish," he ventured to remark. "You have given me quite a lift, and I thank you. I am not used to this line of work, and perhaps that is why I am not making a success of it."

Miss Foster was sympathetic and inclined to be helpful. She named a number of neighbors, and told her visitor that he might tell them that she had directed him to them. His bright, thoughtful glance in response to her kindness really thrilled her. Without apparent purpose the young man drifted into the story of his life. He was the younger son of a foreign duke, he modestly claimed, had struck out for himself in a new country, had made an injudicious investment and was stranded.

What followed that eventful day was a kind of a dream, a daze to Miss Foster after it was all over. Quite incidentally, it appeared she met the handsome polish vendor on the street a day or two later. He was limping, and in response to her inquiries, informed her that he had been laid up since his call at her home with a sprained ankle. Delicately she brought the situation to a point where the young man acknowledged that he was completely out of funds and she insisted on loaning him his needs until he got on his feet again.

She repeated her action at the resentful look that came into his face. It expressed pride, humiliation, the sense of a deep affront. Miss Foster tried to atone for her impetuous action, and then Wilberford Beresford, as he called himself, appeared to recognize her gentle kind-heartedness and tears came into his eyes. He advised her how she could assist him.

There was a small, well-paying business, a stationery and book business in the town for sale. The owner was willing to take $1,000 for the same. Now Marcia had been previously aware of the fact, and this caused her to give credence to other details presented by the wily schemer. He did not wish to borrow the money without security. After an exhibition of shame-facedness he produced a pawn ticket. It called for $800, and for that amount Beresford claimed to have pledged a created ring of his noble house set with several thousand dollars' worth of diamonds. If she would advance the money, he would send for the jewelry, and it would be ample security for the amount of the pledge and the business investment.

"You will be perfectly safe," he declared, "for I can get money from home within a month. I would not sell the ring. I have often thought it shall only be parted with when I wed the woman I love," and his ardent eyes made the fluttering Marcia blush and drop her eyes.

"I will have the money here for you as soon as the bank opens," promised the deluded splinter readily, but she never saw Wilberford Beresford again.

An officer from another city arrested him that night for bigamy and forgery.

Marcia Foster shrank from the chasm into which she had so nearly fallen. She banished the swindler from her thoughts with a shudder, and when Alvin Downey came home her welcoming greeting told him that he would soon win a loving bride.

UNITED STATES GOT BARGAIN

Purchase of Florida From Spain for $6,000,000 Was Decidedly Good Stroke of Business.

More than $6,000,000 was paid by the United States to Spain one hundred years ago for Florida.

In 1819, on the anniversary of the birth of the nation's first president, there was concluded between John Quincy Adams, then secretary of state, and Luis De Onis, minister plenipotentiary of the king of Spain, an agreement and treaty whereby the United States became owner of what were then known as the provinces of East and West Florida.

This territory included not only all of the present state of Florida, but part of what is now Georgia and Alabama, and it was bought for $5,000,000 and the settlement of some claims which amounted to $1,024,741.44, a total of $6,024,741.44.

The language of the remarkable document between the two nations is clear and precise and differs from other treaties to a marked extent. The two men who drew it up were past masters in statesmanship, politics and diplomacy; also, each was the most advanced thinker of the country he represented.

Spain wanted to get rid of her American possessions before they were taken away from her. She was proud, but recognized the fact that she was in no position to wage a long and possibly unsuccessful warfare to hold her colonies.

America wanted the land in this continent held by Spain, but was willing to acquire it by purchase rather than conquest, and with both sides ably represented by the best talent, it was not long before a satisfactory conclusion was reached.

WILL MODEL ALLIED LEADERS

American Sculptor in France Has Been Given the Task of Putting History Into Clay.

Joe Davidson, the American sculptor, now in France, is engaged on a most interesting commission, according to the Manchester Guardian. He is modeling a series of bronze busts of the chief allied military and political leaders. Many have already sat for him, and many, including Haig and Lloyd George, have yet to give sittings. One of the sculptor's recent successes was a bust of Marshal Foch, done in clay, from which the bronze work will be completed. Only two periods of time, totaling five hours, were available for Davidson.

But that proved sufficient. Half way through, the marshal inspected what had been done and smilingly remarked: "Sculpture is not so difficult, after all." He also recalled with some pride that Gustave Dore's illustrations to Poe's works were made in his (Foch's) house. He was only a captain then. The sculptor's description of his sitter is interesting: Foch's broad, high forehead indicates a man of philosophic rather than purely military type, but the deep set, piercing eyes and strong though nose-brush mouth, nose and chin show that the thinker is equally a man of action and decision. From the point of view of physiognomy, a subject of absorbing interest.

Famous Old Tavern Closed.

The rising tide of prohibition has swept away another ancient hostelry, the Blue Anchor, at Front and Dock streets, Philadelphia, claimed to be the oldest tavern in Pennsylvania, and one of the two or three oldest in America.

The Blue Anchor is one of the landmarks of the city. Its walls bear the inscription that the inn was founded in 1682, shortly after the landing of William Penn, when Dock street was Dock creek. As a tavern and bar the building on this site has been operated continuously for 237 years.

Chronicles of Dock street say that the original building was burned in the later years of the eighteenth century, and that the present building dates from about 1789. The inn was long known for its fish dinners.

Heroic Preacher.

In a little cave on a hillside, also under shell fire, a war correspondent found a preacher tending his little group of wounded. The men had fallen too fast that day for the ambulances to carry them all, and so he had picked up a dozen of them, one by one, and carried them back across the shell holes to his little cave in the hill, where he thought they would be safe. All night long, while the guns roared, he made his lonesome journeys out, bringing in new wounded and carrying water to those who cried out for it.—Red Cross Magazine.

Crops Worth Billions.

The cereal crops of the United States were worth over $7,000,000,000 to the farmers who raised them in 1918. The product of these crops, all together, was a little under the total for 1917, but, while the prices of some of the cereals were lower in 1918 than in 1917, the prices of others were sufficiently higher to make the total value of the cereals greater in 1918 by more than a quarter of a billion dollars.

Bubonic Plague in Argentina.

A report from Buenos Aires states that the government of that country is sending a commission to the province of Jujuy for the purpose of fighting the epidemic of bubonic plague, which is reported to be serious. The Santiago dispensary reports 605 cases of typhus fever and 13 deaths.

Proving His Valor

By OTILIA FRANCES PFEIFFER

(Copyright, 1919, by Western Newspaper Union.)

When Ernest Druse came back from the war, bearing the scars of several wounds, a record for exceptional bravery and two honor decorations, the girls of Rockton went fairly wild over him. He was hero, idol, and petted and feted favorite, while stay-at-homes became back numbers, for the time at least.

"He makes me tired!" observed Val Newcomb to a coterie of friends. "He's a monopolizer so far as the company and attentions of the ladies are concerned; that is sure," remarked one of the group.

"Valor, courage and all that sort of stuff! You'd think he had won the war all by himself!" jeered Val. "His last captivity is Esther Wilde. Seems to think all he has to do is to look at a girl and she is his own special property."

"Um! Sour grapes, eh?" was suggested, which Val took with manifest ill-nature and walked away muttering to himself.

"I've got to devise some kind of a move to make myself solid with the girls," he soliloquized, sourly. "It was fair sailing with Esther until that khaki wonder put in an appearance. I don't mind the general lot, but Esther is the pick of them all, has money, beauty and social position, and I'm not going to give up my hopes and dreams so easily. I'm going to set my thinking machinery at work and see if I can't devise some scheme to get the upper hand of this audacious military marvel."

It was two days later when Val visited a drinking place in the slum portion of the town, and was engaged in an earnest, low-toned conversation with a rough appearing denizen of the place for some time.

"Think you can carry out the program?" was his final interrogation of him of low brows and furtive, evil eyes.

"Trust me for staging the act according to rule," was the confident reply.

"All right. Don't disappoint me Tuesday night from eleven to twelve." Now Val had invited Esther to a local entertainment for Tuesday evening and had prevailed upon her to accompany him.

At the close of the entertainment they sauntered homeward slowly. It was an exquisitely perfect June night and Val kept his eye on Esther, scanning tree and bush for the lurker he expected to help him "stage a real act of valor."

He was simply courteous to Esther and did not seek to press his attentions, for which Esther was truly grateful, but all the time he was congratulating himself over the inevitable homage and admiration that would be due him when the act was consummated.

There was a precious heirloom in the Wilde family, with which all Rockton was familiar. It was a diamond sunburst, which Esther always wore on important occasions. Val made sure that it was in place upon this particular evening. Its value was very considerable and he knew that its loss would be deeply mourned by the fair girl he hoped to make his bride.

"Oh, dear!" suddenly exclaimed Esther, shrinking back in terror. A man, wearing a half-mask over his face, had sprung from behind a tree. In a twinkling he had despoiled Esther of the jeweled ornament.

"Stop, you ruffian!" shouted Val, disengaging Esther's arm, leaping upon the audacious robber and flinging him to the ground.

"Go easy, mister!" snarled the latter, and leveling a revolver, he struggled to his feet.

"Be careful!" quavered Esther. "He is going to shoot!"

The footpad did shoot. Two sharp reports rang out. The highwayman turned and fled.

"I will restore your property if I have to follow that miscreant to the ends of the earth!" vowed Val.

"Don't risk your life—" began Esther, but with an injunction to hurry home to safety Val dashed in hot pursuit of the thief, and both were lost to sight.

Esther did not enter the house when she reached it, but stood at the garden gate, peering anxiously down the street. She was quite solicitous as to the welfare of her courageous champion, although not one whit perturbed at the loss of the ornament. Then she expressed a sigh of relief. At the end of half an hour Val came into view. His attire was all awry, his collar torn out of place.

"A deadly struggle and a desperate villain!" announced Val. "He escaped me, but not until I had wrested from him your precious property," and Val extended the sunburst.

"Precious!" repeated Esther, with a slight smile. "Oh, Mr. Newcomb! Why did you so foolishly risk injury for a mere trifle? This is only a substitute paste imitation which I have been wearing while the real ornament is being reset."

Val Newcomb witted. All the same he felt he must have demonstrated a bravery Esther could not fail to admire. She gave him full need of praise until his bribed emissary, while under the influence of liquor, let out the details of the secret compact.

Then Val Newcomb quietly left town for the engagement of Esther and Ernest had been announced that same day
