

EVERYTHING JUST RIGHT

By T. B. ANDERSON

If Netta and Dorothy Bissell, sisters, had remained at home instead of catching the city fever, they would not have been responsible for a second hebra from Brookville on the part of Warren and Bert Spencer, brothers.

The Bissell and the Spencer families joined and the four had grown up together as playmates. In later years Warren had courted Netta and Bert had kept company with Dorothy, and it looked as though the two neighbor families were destined to be still more closely linked together.

Netta was church organist and gave music lessons. Dorothy had graduated and had served as an extra district schoolteacher. Both were restlessly ambitious. They had heard of the golden opportunities lying in wait in the city for bright, up-to-date girls. Netta had saved some money and meditated a course at some standard musical college.

"We won't stand in your way of a success in life, girls," said patient plodding John Bissell, and a little later Warren and Bert Spencer stood forlornly watching a departing train disappear beyond the little old railroad station, hearing away from them into the dark and uncertain unknown the objects of their sincerest devotion.

Then there came about naturally their ardent longing to be near those from whom they had parted. The Spencer family went through the same ordeal as their neighbors.

"Give the boys a chance," submitted Richard Spencer, and Warren and Bert followed the lead of their undaunted girl neighbors, the former dreaming of fame as a lawyer, his brother filled with enthusiasm as an embryo editor, author, or whatever came along in the literary line.

Netta was missed at the church organ and Dorothy had little student friends who mourned her desertion, for she had won their love completely. Many a time Richard Spencer straightened up from grubbing with his hoe and leaned upon it, and dreamily looking, thinking of the pride and pleasure he had taken in the past in having his stalwart, diligent elder son, Warren, in the next field, whistling cheerily while he did the work of two ordinary toilers from sheer strength and the ardor of living amid nature. It was the fond mother who grieved over Bert, the youngest. His farm duties were lighter.

Cheerful, hopeful letters came to the respective families after the departure of these dear ones and very often the desolated ones spent the evening in company, their one theme the loved children far away. The Bissell girls were living in a community house under careful supervision. The Spencer boys occupied a room together nearby and they saw one another nearly every day.

In the city the brave, struggling souls who had found disillusion where they had anticipated a sure fruition of the impulses of youth and ambition had one by one sorrowed because of their disappointment. The pressures of homesickness resulted in a general confession of longing for home. Love, too, had blossomed the while, and centered interest away from the sordid promises of the world. Netta acknowledged a lack of interest in the minutiae of music which took in fads and fancies of melody subservient to jazz doggerel, love songs and ragtime. Dorothy resented the hard, practical training that would take her among serious, solemn students cherishing theories and fads.

Warren found the law promised a hard and long apprenticeship, and Bert the road to literary fame full of twists and turns and the caprice of an exacting public.

John Bissell and Richard Spencer had been away for two days attending a grange convention at a neighboring county seat. It was late in the afternoon when they got off of the train on their return. In the hearts of both there was a vivid sense of returning to homes bereft of their brightest treasures. Each was absorbed along the line of that suggestive thought. Abruptly as they passed the little union church of the village, they halted. Swelling out upon the air was an old familiar hymn.

"John, it sounds like Netta's playing," he observed, and together they stole to an open window of the structure and looked in.

"It's Netta—she has come back," uttered Bissell tremulously, "and oh! Richard, someone is waving from our porch."

"Dorothy," cried Spencer—"with the old calico hoodress on—"

"Look—look, Richard," shouted Bissell excitedly—"over in your field pitching hay—Warren!"

Richard Spencer choked up and nearly fell over. "Oh! could it be true that the welcome wanderer had returned!" He knew that it was so, as out through the broad farm gateway came the team, and in the driver's seat was Bert.

"Out of the way," he yelled like some delighted boy. "Got to get some things for ma in the town. Oh, dad, we've come back to stay. And everything is just right."

A DREAMER OF DREAMS

By JESSIE E. SHERWIN

(Copyright, 1920, Western Newspaper Union)

Blossom time in the Valley of Happy Days! A dreamland garden spread out by nature, as if for lovers only! It was no wonder, as they wandered hand in hand across the velvety sward and the very birds seemed to warble the loveliest melodies for their enraptured ears alone, that Evan Reese and Miriam Wayne felt that the world was made for them alone and that life was all of love and happiness.

"Sweetheart mine," murmured Evan, "it will not be long before we shall have our own little home in the most beautiful spot in this most beautiful paradise. We have revealed in starshine and flowers, and bird song, and perfumed breezes, and poetry, and dreaming. The practical calls now, but memory will sweeten and hallow the golden days we have passed amid these lovely scenes."

She clung to his strong arm and leaned her fair golden head lightly on his shoulder in a vision seraphic, the rapt smile on her face, the ecstatic glow in her eyes revealing the pure soul within. He was all sincerity and honor, she a lovely bud, just expanded into the full flower of radiant girlhood. The pretty village nestled in a golden haze beyond the end of the valley. They had paused at the entrance of a gentle slope, gowned with flowering trees and commanding a view of alternating dale and brook for miles across the sun-gilded expanse.

"I have secured an option on the site here, just two acres," spoke Evan, "and the owner will hold it for me indefinitely. When I go back to work it will be rare happiness to prepare the plans for the bungalow. As I progress I will send the first outlines to you, to accept or alter at your will. Two years is not long, and by the end of that time, with hard work and economy, I shall have sufficient to build the little nest that shall echo all day with your merry song and laughter." Dreamers of dreams, alas! for their sublime faith in goodness even in the other, in the smooth, even materialization of their hopes and plans. Evan went to Chicago from the little village where he and Miriam had been born to become cashier and bookkeeper for a distant relative, who made a business of purchasing commercial paper on a small capital.

He was Adam May, and he had a customer named Rupert Warren, a broker, who borrowed on a limit of ten thousand dollars, always on a special and reliable collateral. One day when Evan's employer was away Warren entered the office in great urgency. "The full amount," he said. "There are the usual securities," and so regular and reliable had been the dealings of Warren with the house that Evan simply glanced at the securities, saw they bore the usual name, "Midland," gave a check for ten thousand dollars and entered the transaction upon his books.

It was the next morning that rumor flew about in business circles that Rupert had absconded, leaving nothing but debts. Then Adam May made a discovery that crushed him. Warren had foisted on him not securities in the Midland Construction Co., a prosperous concern, but those of the Midland Building Co., a stock jobbing promotion whose stock was not worth the paper it was printed on. Of course he blamed Evan, and the latter censured himself for not examining documents more closely. The loss of the money crippled May, but honest Evan Reese came to his relief.

"Mr. May," he said manfully, "the loss is due to my carelessness. I will work for you until the amount is paid up for my simple board and lodging. The rest of my earnings will go to a fund to recoup you."

It was the only way of honor, and Miriam, with a sigh, with ten years hard servitude before them, gave up all her bright dreams and urged him to the noble sacrifice.

Miriam found employment in a store in the village. Evan labored nights at extra work, striving to reduce the great debt he was obligated to pay. Those two met only once a year, and then only one afternoon, for the hours of work were daily precious to them. It was just at the beginning of summer two years later, however, that a week's vacation came for both at the same time.

He had grown older and more serious. The roses in Miriam's cheeks had faded somewhat, but sublime faith one in the other was as bright as in those olden days when they had roamed and dreamed, as they roamed and dreamed now.

They sat on the green sward in the shade of some bushes near to the site where the dream house had never been built except in their fancy. There was a strain of sadness to their mutual coming together, they glanced over the plans for a little home framed when joy and youth glided all the future.

"It may be years, but we will not give up our hope," spoke Evan tenderly.

"It will not be years," spoke an intruding voice, and both stared at a man bronzed, bearded, who had stepped into view.

"You don't remember me?" he asked.

"Think again. I am Rupert Warren. I made good in my exile. I went to see May to pay up what I had no right to take. He sent me to you, and I have come to restore to you the money that will build your house of dreams."

DOCTOR OF HEARTS

By BETTY M'INTYRE.

(Copyright, 1920, Western Newspaper Union)

Phyllis was a talented, well-educated, handsome but unspolled child of wealth. The male portion of Kingstown openly adored her, while the contrary sex secretly copied her manners, gowns and her style in hair-dressing.

She was a born matchmaker and quarrel-patcher, and when any of the girls of the town were heartbroken over some John Henry, she was sought, and although she was only twenty-two, her advice was sage. In this way she had earned the name that the boys had given her, "doctor of hearts."

When her friends wrote to her they always placed D. O. H. after her name, and with smiling good-nature she accepted their fun, and no one ever guessed that the doctor's own heart needed mending.

Many of her admirers proposed to her, but she refused them all, for she did not love them, and she was a firm believer in whole-hearted love or none at all. She very tactfully found some charming girl for each of the disappointed swains.

One beautiful morning the doctor, feeling rather lazy, took an interesting book and some red-checked apples that vied with her own cheeks for rosinness, and settled herself in the couch hammock to wait in comfort for the mail man. When he arrived she smiled as she read the D. O. H. placed after her name on four of her letters. She smilingly opened one of them and read a long letter from one of her "patients" who had found happiness. One letter bore a foreign postmark, but the usual D. O. H. was there, and she was puzzled, for as far as she knew, none of her friends were abroad, and the address being typewritten, gave her no information. She slit the envelope and read:

"Dear Phyllis—At last I have found where you live. Until tonight I have been unable to find you, although I have searched for the past three years. After I returned to Camden and found you gone, I ran down every possible clue to find you, but all in vain. Last week I came here from London, for I knew of your fondness for Egypt, but I could find nothing here until tonight, when I dropped into the English club, and here I met a chap named Clark, who knew you. When he told me that you were not married, I made up my mind to see you at once, and beg your forgiveness. If I can, for my foolishness. So I am coming to you as fast as I can, with the hope in my heart that you still love me a little. Yours forever,

"TOM BEVERLY."

The rest of the mail was forgotten, and her dancing heart made her eyes glow with a wonderful light. Tom was coming to her after three long years, and he had searched until he had found her; the silly thing they had quarreled over was forgotten. For the next three days she lived in a fever of expectancy, and each day found her dressed in some wonderful dress, for she was anxious to look well when he came. For a week she watched for him at train time, but he did not come. One morning in her plain gingham dress she curled up in the hammock to rest and sleep and dream of his coming. She woke to find Tom leaning over her, and with a glad cry her arm encircled his neck and in the kiss that followed all the pain of the years was forgotten.

Suddenly she became conscious of her plain dress, and asked him to excuse her until she changed it.

"Why change it, sweetheart? You are wonderful in that dress, and silk or satin could not improve you any." And then, in the approved fashion, he told her just how wonderful she was to him. With a happy sigh the little doctor of hearts dropped her head on his shoulder. A shrill whistle and the postman entered the yard with several letters, all with the D. O. H. after her name. Tom, picking up one from where she threw them into the hammock, kissed the D. O. H. as he said, with his arm around her, "Doctor of hearts is a good name for you, my darling, for you sure can fix sick hearts, but after the way you have fixed mine, I'll tell the world that to me D. O. H. means delight of heaven."

Largest Dictionary.

The ponderous dictionaries of Europe, even the famous many-volumed etymological Index of Larousse, which is the monumental work of all modern tongues, are more than surpassed by the Arabic dictionaries of 500 years ago, which are still the great authority for students in that language.

The Arabic dictionary most used by scholars who are familiar with no other language is in 20 quarto volumes and weighs close to 100 pounds. There is a large 50 pound, 10 volume abridgment of it, presumably for use at home. This and practically all the Arabic dictionaries were made in the time of the great Harun-al-Raschid.

Little to it.

"Now and then we see a pair of turtle doves out in a car, with the man driving and the girl hugging the man."

"Well?"

"But it doesn't look like much of a success from the standpoint of either."
