A STREAK OF LUCK

By GENEVIEVE ULMAR

(Copyright, 1920, Western Newspaper Union.)

A thousand dollars was not much, but it fairly dazzled Mark Seaton. He had led a happy-go-lucky existence for over five years exploiting mining prospects and real estate booms, had lived from hand to mouth and the unexpected legacy of what to him seemed to be a substantial sum of money brought new ambition and dreams of opulence.

It was William Morse, an old-time partner, who had remembered him thus strangely after they had not met for ten years. The money was paid promptly to Seaton, who emerged from the threadbare vagabond into a quite presentable and well dressed man.

"I'll make the thousand real capital, no wasteful living it up," decided Seaton. "There's chances down in the new oil fields near Elmore. I'll be careful, wary and economical until I get on my feet. And this time I'll stay there."

Seaton put up at a hotel at Elmore and began looking around for business chances. At the end of a week he decided that $3 a day was too steep for him. He had been told that a widow, a Mrs. Alma Bryce, had room and board for a respectable guest who was good pay. Seaton one morning walked up to her little home. He found her absent, but her two little children were playing in the yard. Handsome, hearty Mrs. Bryce came home to find the trio the very best friends in the world. Seaton presented his plea for housing, and cleanliness and prime cooking made his new home a palace to him.

"You are the kind of a woman I've always pictured in my mind as pretty nigh perfect," he declared one day. One day Seaton came home to find a stranger seated on the porch enjoying its coolness and shade.

"Been waiting for you, Mr. Seaton," announced the visitor crisply. "I'm named Burt Talbot and I'm a speculator. I heard you were to be in Elmore and I wanted to have first chances at that oil land of yours down at Herkimer Forks."

"Aren't you mistaken?" inquired Seaton. "I own no land anywhere." "I expected that—natural for a tenderfoot to be cautious. All right, I'm square. I happen to know that a certain tract is registered in the name of Mark Seaton and have some parties who might be prevailed upon to give a snug sum for it."

Now Seaton was clever. Could it be possible that William Morse had added to his benefaction and included some property? He decided to consult the records and find out. Meantime he would be duly "politic" with his visitor.

"You see," Talbot enlightened him effusively, "I'm only a go-between. Ten per cent commission is all I'm offered. My buyers have all the equipment to handle your land and capital enough to stand a risk. Shall I feel my way on a $20,000 basis, say?"

"Too little," dissented Seaton. "All right, if I get your figure and there is a sale will you see that I am paid for my services?"

"Oh, sure!" acceded Seaton, and after the man had left, hurried to the record office. Sure enough, there was the document on file showing that over five years ago a "Mark Seaton of Denver," had owned the property in question.

"That settles it—some other Mark Seaton," soliloquized Mrs. Bryce's boarder and went and played with the children to forget his shattered dream.

But two days later a letter was sent to him which had been delivered at the hotel. Seaton read it to find that it was from "Your wife, Nella," at Denver to "Mark Seaton" of the same place. It hoped that her husband would make a sale of his oil land at any price, as the mortgage on their home was due, and she advised him to make any sacrifice to get a needed $4,000.

"Ah! here is something to think about, indeed," meditated Seaton. "Evidently this namesake of mine is on his way to Elmore to sell his property. Four thousand dollars! Why! that fellow Talbot mentioned five times that, first move!"

Two days later Talbot appeared with an offer of $30,000 cash for the land. The very next morning, going to the hotel, Mark Seaton of Elmore found that Mark Seaton of Denver had registered there. He went at once up to the room of the new arrival.

"Mr. Seaton," he said, "we happen to bear the same name and this letter to you was delivered to me by mistake. Come on to sell your land down at Herkimer Forks, I understand."

"Why, yes, I've got to, as I am hard pressed financially. Is there any chance of getting rid of it somewhere around $5,000?"

"Will you authorize me to take double that?"

"Yes, and I'll divide all over $10,000 50-50."

He was true to his word and within 48 hours Seaton the landless possessed $15,000 minus $4,000 commission paid to Talbot. He sought out his landlady, "Mrs. Bryce," he said, "if I had been sure I could support you and these dear little ones, I'd have asked you to marry me the first day I saw you."

"Oh! money isn't everything in the world," fluttered the handsome widow. "I've found out I can," proceeded Seaton. "What say, eh?" And Mrs. Bryce replied with the simple affirmative so gladly spoken when love inspires its utterance.
