These mounds serve to shed water and are therefore undesirable, and in a dry year they may even be detrimental. It takes but a few minutes of hoeing to level the mounds. In regions where droughts are common it is a good practice to so grade the surface around the trees to a radius of four or five feet that the slope will be toward the trees, thus making a basin to hold the water when it does rain.

ers of the College of Agriculture. One of the poultry specialists sent out by the College found a professional henhouse sprayer gathering in the dollars. He sprayed at so much a gallon and instead of spraying he flooded. At one place he usel twelve gallons of mixture where one gallon should have the work. In addition to covering the walls, floors, roosts, coops and other equipment, he soaked the hovers, and the fumes killed scores of chicks. In another part of the state a professional culler has been plying his trade charging 5 cents a bird for those culled and selling a culling "secret" for $10. Eighteen of these "secrets" were sold in one county. Another agent dld a thriving business selling a patent roost by the foot. One farm bureau is waging active campaign against a certain book agent. At one meeting every farmer present confessed he had purchased a book. The price was $10.75.

One gallon of waterglass will make enough solution to preserve fifty or sixty dozen eggs, says the State College of Agriculture, which favors the plan of every family storing eggs for winter use. The solution is made up of one part waterglass to nine parts water. Boil the water and allow it to cool before adding the waterglass. The containers should be either earthenware or wooden pails, and should have covers. Storage should be in a cool and well ventilated place.
