Miss Gladys Stegall returned Monday from Madrid where she spent two days visiting. She made the trip by airplane.

Examination and consultation free.

Into the shabby old library came, shyly, Nora. Between the doorway curtains she paused uncertainly; It was evident that the family were in council concerning her own small self.

"Come in Honora," said one sisterin-law briskly, "we are discussing the matter of your future. Now, that old Uncle Peter is dead, you will have, of course, to seek a home elsewhere. I must say, Uncle Peter was astonishingly careless in his living."

"The poor old fellow has long been an invalid," her husband reminded her. "Well I'm sure," spoke up the second sister-in-law, "Philip has done more than most nephews in helping him along. Because Philip happens to be prosperous is no reason why he should be a source of support for dependent relatives."

"If you please," spoke Nora gently, from the doorway, "I'll be going." And she was gone.

"Such a queer girl," sighed Peter's wife, "she has even caught Uncle's soft brogue. And has no more idea of responsibility than a kitten. She is not fitted for any branch of business that I can see. What are we going to do with her?"

"Honora was old Peter's constant nurse," her husband meekly defended. "She hasn't been able to leave the old fellow for years-not since he befriended her when she was orphaned and little more than a child." "Whenever I called," his wife retalinted, "Nora was usually humming about the garden. Used to lie there in a hammock swinging and singing, while Uncle idolized her from the porch. Everything that girl did was just right in his eyes. He would hesitate to disturb her idle hour by asking for a glass of water when thirsty. When it was too cold for hammock lolling, Nora was usually at that cracked old plane. She certainly took little advantage of her spare time."

"Nora used to play mighty pretty things," Philip said reminiscently, "I liked to hear her sing them in that sympathetic little way all her own. It was the only pleasure the kid had."

Peter looked up with a question in his eyes, then turned away disappoint-

"I am glad," he said in a low tone to his brother, "that we were able to persuade Gransby to attend Uncle Peter. Uncle used to be good to us when we were boys and Gransby's about the best surgeon in this part of the country. I was surprised when after seeing old Peter, he agreed to take on the case. Gransby is coming out to take dinner with us today," Peter informed his wife.

She frowned. "And you did not let Phone 307 me know in time so that I could have sister Myra here. You know that Dr. Gransby is the sought-after in Myra's Office phone 241.

"Little good it will do those beautiful maidens from what I hear," answered Philip. "Donald Gransby is married to his profession."

Far out on the lawn the family saw Nora despondently standing, her arm about the neck of Uncle Peter's loved old horse. Then, into the family circle came, with his assured easy tread, the successful young surgeon. Dr. Gransby's smile however lacked its usual assurance, his fine face looked tired and worn.

"We were," Philip informed him, debating what might be best for Nora to do. Perhaps you can help us."

The surgeon accepted the chair pushed out for him, then as promptly arose to walk impatiently the length of the room.

"The very best thing for her to do," he said emphatically, "Is to marry me. For more than three weeks I bave been trying to impress that fact upon

It was Peter's wife who broke the ilence which followed. "You mean." she asked unbelieving, "that you have sked Nora to marry you, and sherefused? Surely the girl could not be o indifferent to her advantage?"

Donald Gransby smiled; it was a ender smile. "Nora," he replied, "is not a girl who thinks of advantage where love appens to be the important issue. Nors-is different. Perhaps that is why I love her so.' "I think the girl is confused with her problems and success," said Donald Gransby, "Of course you have heard that Reverto, the concert singer, is greatly interested in Nora's compositions and undoubted talent. She went, I believe, directly to him after one of his recitals and submitted one of her songs for his consideration, Reerto went wild over the lilting air, and is publishing it on his own account. He tells me that Nora will undoubtedly reap a fortune. He used to rive out here to Uncle Peter's to have her improvise for him. And naturally fell in love with her sweet sincerity and simplicity. So Reverto also has sked Nora to marry him! And both of us we wait."

The clock ticked loudly in the shaby library. Across the lawn, slowly ame Nora. They heard her opening hords as she scated berself before he tinkling old plane in the parlor. Then Donald Gransby jumped to his feet and hurried through the door. And fter her murmured word of greeting o him, the still listening family heard Norg's eloquent music change suddens from piaintive sadness to unmis takable joy.
