ASK A POLICEMAN

By RUTH BIRDSALL.

(6. 1921, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate. She was tiny and timid, a slip of a girl, with the freshness of country daisles and green fields about her. For many minutes she had been standing by the big revolving doors of Beacon's department store, searching every face as the crowds surged in and out,

Choking back the persistent sobs and fears, she realized that she must think and think hard She had heard that in all big cities there were men whose duty it was to very careful about speaking to people promiseuously. "Always ask a policeman"-that was

it. "Always ask a policeman," mother had said, and Aunt Carrie had said, and Cousin Lucina had said-"Always ask a policeman."

Through the thinning crowd she sifted, glancing timidly about, until she spled a big, glowing-faced policeman regulations

I'm lost! Please tell me what to do?" policeman, "Well, who is Jim, and where do you live?" Autos honked, drivers shouted and pedestrians scowled and scolded while Officer Dane Batened to the half-sobbed story of the little country Dalsy. "Jim is James Dee from Chicago, and I've run away from home to marry him, and now I can't find him. I'm so afraid something has happened to him. Please find him for me." Officer Dane signalled for the impatient drivers and pedestrians to cross, Fuming and seething, they swept past the stalwart man and the frightened girl. The spot upon which they stood was like a tiny island in a tempestubus sea of traffic. "Walt a minute," encouraged Dane, "and I'll help you."

Soon the home-bound rush hour was sheltered corner.

about it," and his kindly blue eyes invited confidence.

Hesitatingly Dalsy explained that Jim had come to her home in Danbury before when her mother had advertised for a few boarders to help fill the family pocketbook. Jim was wonderful-the finest man in the world. He loved her but mother didn't trust him and wanted to know him better before giving her consent. Finally, Jim's vacation being over, he had found it imcouldn't let him go without her; so Blg Bill Dane pondered a moment, "Do you love this Dee fellow well enough, little lady, to go back home tonight and face the music alone, while I hunt for him?"

"Oh, if I only could go home," she sobbed. "I'd never run away again," Gently Officer Dane led Daisy, somewhat crumpled and crushed, through the now quieter streets to the railroad station where, promising her news in the morning, he placed her on the train for Danbury Hill,

The next noon a trim, big-shouldered, blue-eyed man swung off the train at Danbury Hill station. Daisy, from the hill-top, watched him climb the hill and come straight up to her

"Good morning, little lady," he sang out to her. "How's your heart this morning? All battered and torn or can it stand a little shaking up?"

"Why, it's my policeman," gasped Dalsy, "only you aren't a policeman at all."

"Oh, yes; I am a policeman, all right," chuckled Dane; "but it's my day off and I came to deliver my message in person. It's not I who am masquerading, but James Dee of Chicago, U. S. A.

"Masquerading?" the farm. He mopped his cheerful face and beamed a smile of understanding that warmed Daisy's heart.

"I thought I was right yesterday," he said. "but I wanted to be sure before I took a chance of breaking your little heart. Your friend Jim never drug store. Many a lemon and lime for one this morning. He was just back from a month's vacation. Here's a note he sent you, by the way."

Trembling Dalsy opened the note, while Dane strolled away, his heart singing as it had never sung before. "Dear Daisy"-the note read. "I'm a cad. I'm not a rich guy from Chicago at all, so I quit you cold yesterday. You're too good a girl to jolly. Bill Dane ferreted me out. He's some letective and the squarest man I know. Forgive and forget. Jim." The afternoon train was leaving Danbury Hill station for the city as a broad-shouldered man with glad blue eyes jumped gally on the rear plat-"Good-by, little lady," he shouted. "I'll be back for my vacation-and, say, that family advice of yours is all rimit "Always ask a policeman.' Don't forget to follow IL"
