HOME.

By GERTRUDE ROCKWELL.

Susan Kent was cutting her flowers. The big blue bush by the front door hung low with its load of purple clusters. Mrs. Kent's scissors snipped lavishly, and occasionally she held a spray against her white cheeks. Her cheeks and her hair had whitened rapidly since that day nearly a year ago when Derry had come home. She tried to keep her thoughts from going back to that homecoming, so different from her plans. She tried to thank God that Derry had come home, even though in some strange way he had left the living, thinking part of him in France.

She looked tenderly over to where Derry sat on the door step, playing with a spray of lilac.

Down the street came a swift patter of feet, and a little girl stopped at the gate. She was dressed in white, with a red, white and blue cap.

"Flowers ready, Mrs. Kent?" she inquired, smoothing down her starched skirts.

"All ready, Gladys, and about all you can carry, my dear." She came over and placed the big bouquet in the child's arms. Derry was looking at the red, white and blue cap. He shook his head slowly, and brushed his hand over his eyes.

"You aren't going to the parade?" asked Gladys, as she started off.

"No dear; I don't think Derry wants to go today," Mrs. Kent replied, steadily.

Derry went over and lay down in the hammock. Mrs. Kent paused on the steps to see him settled.

"While you have a little nap, I'll get the work done, dear," she said, as she went in the house.

Presently down town the band began to play. As the faint sounds and the rumble of the drums came up the street, the boy in the hammock sat up. Again the slight frown wrinkled his forehead, and he brushed his eyes with his hand.

The boom of the drum drew nearer. Derry stood up. He went down the gravel walk, and opening the gate stepped out. He paused. The splendor of the national anthem came to his ears.

Derry looked puzzled and walked toward the sound.

Mrs. Kent worked quietly about the house for some time. Derry usually slept most of the forenoon. She tried to shut her ears to the music, and the knowledge that out there, khaki-clad lads, strong, intelligent, were paying honor to those who slept.

The boom of the snuffing guns' snore upon her ears. She went to the door and peeped at the hammock. It was empty. In swift alarm she glanced about the yard and saw the open gate. In 10 months Derry had never been out there alone. She ran down the street trying to steady her trembling knees. With sure instinct she made for the cemetery. He had gone to the parade.

She sped on. The procession was winding slowly out, drums muted, music stilled. The sun caught in the crease of the silken flag at the head of the column, and the breeze flung it forth, red as the sacrificial blood of its slain, white as the souls of its heroic womanhood, blue as the heavens that had granted and moulded it. But she had eyes for none of these. Only dimly did she see the thin line of blue, the white-clad girls, the sturdy marching lines of khaki. On and on they passed, and at last she saw him across the moving pageant. He was standing alone at the edge of the crowd, the dazed wondering frown still on his face.

Forgetting the procession she started across the street. The last of the marchers had passed, and the autos carrying the old veterans were following.

It all happened so quickly. In the very instant that Mrs. Kent started across the street Derry saw her, saw, too, the autos bearing down upon her. Mrs. Kent saw him leap, felt his swift arms about her, and did she hear or did she dream that vibrant voice shouting "Mother?"

Darkness closed about her, a thick, palpitating darkness that whirled and sang with strange noises. After a long time it lifted, and she saw the kind old face of Dr. Brown bending over her. She lay on her own bed. Mrs. Kent stayed up with one cry—"Derry." The doctor put on a detaining hand.

"Just a minute Mrs. Kent. Something remarkable has happened. I hardly know."

"Where is Derry?" demanded the mother.

"Derry is awake and is asking for you."

"Is he?" Then the vibrant voice was not a dream.

WHIPPING POST FOR WIFE BEATERS

Being a sheriff in Maryland involves the task of using the whipping post whenever wife beaters get active. The photo shows Sheriff McNelly, of Baltimore, administering the "cat-o-nine" tails to Cornelius Smith who had beaten his wife with a rolling pin. This is the first time in nine years whipping post has been used.

This Is Fair Week

and the Lincoln County Farmers are certainly teaching the rest of us a very important lesson in courage and perseverance. It hasn't been a particularly good summer for crops but the exhibits at the Fair show that the farmers of the county have not been discouraged by their drawbacks and their problems but they have gone ahead with their work from day to day and the result is that there is an exhibit of farm products at the fair of which they may justly be proud. We are proud of it and of them.
