EXPERIMENT STATION SPECIALIST WRITES OF BETTER SEED GRAIN

The following article was written by L. L. Zook, crop specialist at the North Platte Experimental substation and is worthy of careful reading by every farmer in western Nebraska:

In good farming the variety, quality and source of the seed used is a factor second only to the care exercised in seed bed preparation and cultivation. Under certain conditions it may outweigh all other factors in determining profits. The grains which result from the use of good seed are secured with less effort and usually at less expense than those derived from any other source.

One of the lines of crop work carried on at the North Platte Experiment Station is the comparison of various varieties and strains of grain. An effort is made to increase for distribution the more promising of these in such quantities as the space limitations of the station permit. The quantities so produced are never large. These are offered for sale at slightly above market price to cover cost of cleaning, storing and handling. The demand for this seed has always been greater than the supply, and it is necessary to limit the amount sold to any one party.

It is a regrettable fact that many farmers who have secured this seed have made but little effort to preserve its purity with the result that within a few years the crops produced cannot be sold as pure seed. The same farmers thus frequently come back for a fresh supply of seed from the station. The interests of good farming would have been better served had these farmers maintained the purity of their seed stocks and made available a larger supply for sale to other farmers.

The enormous increase possible with any grain crop is illustrated in the history of Kanred wheat. The original supply of this now popular wheat came from the selection of a single head at the Kansas Experiment station in 1906. This was carried along with many other selections until on account of its particular promise distribution was made in a limited way in 1917. By 1921, it had replaced other winter wheats on an estimated area of 2,000,000 acres.

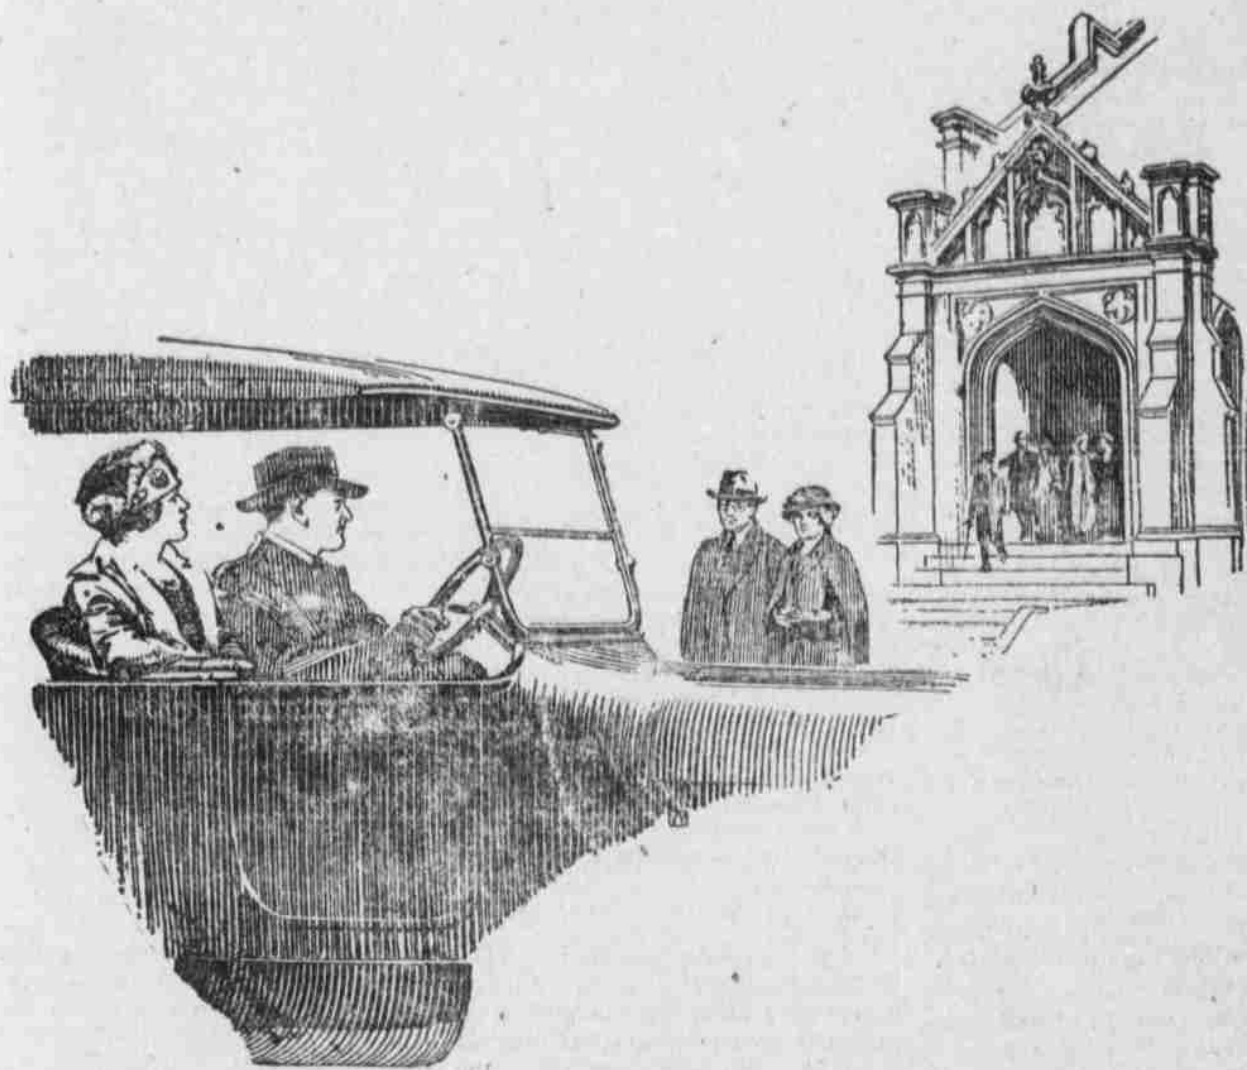

The frequent reason why farmers become careless in maintaining pure seed, after getting a start, is the reluctance of other farmers to pay more than market price for any kind of seed. In 1921, Rosen rye on the station yielded 27 bushels per acre in comparison with 18 bushels per acre for common rye. At 60 cents per bushel the better seed thus produced an excess gross profit of $5.40 per acre. On this basis it would be profitable to pay several times market price for the better seed. Yet several farmers in Lincoln county last fall hauled Rosen rye to the elevators because their neighbors were unwilling to pay a premium for the seed.

The farmer who produces pure seed cleans it and makes the supply available is entitled to a return for his time and effort, and to the cooperation of his fellow farmer. Such farmers are needed in every community.

The seed inspection service under the Agricultural Extension department of the university, is able to furnish certification on various types of grain. This is a protection to both producer and grower. Through this service and closer co-operation among themselves, the farmers of the state can within a short time greatly increase the quality of its crop output.

The station has on hand at this time a supply of Kherson Nebraska No 21 white oats, sufficient to furnish a few farmers each with 20-bushel lots, also a few bushels of good seed Kubanka Durum wheat. We are anxious to supply these to farmers who will grow them for seed purposes. We are not interested in selling seed to those who wish it to produce feed only.
