

CHATS WITH YOUR GAS MAN

While the use of gas for lighting dates back for more than a hundred years, gas has been a standard domestic fuel, particularly in our cities, for less than fifty years. Within that remarkably short time, however, gas has come into use for cooking the meals of forty-five million American people, in addition to heating millions of gallons of water each year.

So universal has become its use that if the residents of our larger cities were suddenly forced to return to coal instead of gas, it would require nearly all the streets, alleys and vacant lots to store it. Furthermore, coal fires could not be built in apartment houses, because no provision has been made and the tenants of our modern buildings would have to camp out in the open in order to get cooked food.

Take away gas service from our big cities, and the next day people would be living like gypsies in camps around each coal pile!

Two French workmen were talking at a public bar. Of course, since they were not talking about horse racing, they were talking about politics.

"The various national debts go up into trillions of francs," declared one, with the air of a man who is saying something astounding.

The other didn't blink. "Trillions, I say," thundered the first. "Do you know what a trillion is?"

"Yes," drawled his friend, "the same as a billion, only a lot more zeros."

"Periwinkle House" is not a long novel; rather, a novelette, but it is the latest work of Opie Read and therefore an event in literature. It contains some new manifestations of the author's humor and philosophy, some character types, a love story, and a treatment of episodes, all entirely different from anything heretofore written by him. Reading it is like turning back the pages of time and going into an earlier and more romantic period.

DON'T MISS IT.
