It ran down a rafter, tearing it to pieces and loosening the shingles for a strip about six inches wide down one side of the roof. Plastering was knocked off in one room and soot scattered all over the house. The bolt jumped from one side of the room straight across to the opposite side, going out over the door, tearing the casing and splintering one board of the siding. Fortunately no one was at home at the time. The house was not set afire. As the house was insured, the loss will be made good.
