PIRACY IN THE LEVANT. It Exists in a Small Way, But Its Palmy Days Have Passed.

In a large wholesale way of business, Levantine piracy may be called extinct. No longer are the tideless waters swept by the galleys of the Algerine, nor do we often at church find collections being made for mariners captive among the Moors. The genial old ruffian who made his prisoners drink to the king over the water is to-tally extinct. But in a small way, with very limited capital and enterprise sadly thwarted, the isles that burning Sappho loved and sang still see a good deal of business done on the old lines. The practice rather resembles maritime burglary, per-haps, than anything worthy to be called piracy, and the practitioners are natives of mixed race. A small schooner or vessel, a hardy crew, a few Lucifer matches, and such revolvers as can be procured suffice for an outfit. The method is commonly as follows:

The shores of the isles are studded by little villages as far from the sweet ministry of the police as wild Kintail, and we cannot put it more strongly. The wealth of the villagers mainly consists in old silver vessels and ornaments, often of beauty and great antiquity. A sponge diver, for example, has found more than sponges. In the British museum there is a recent acquisition, a pot made of gold, weighing as much as 100 sovereigns. This was brought up from a classical wreck by a sponge diver, and it is likely enough that such discoveries are frequently made and concealed. The villagers have also the silver ornaments of their women's dowries, often old and curious, and there may be a few relies of antique gems, rings, necklets, and armlets, spoils of ravges of the Mycenæan age. As the tax gatherers are prompt to levy on all property, this little wealth is, of course, carefully hidden, perhaps under the thatch. The pirate's first care is to obtain private information as to who is rich among the people apparently as destitute as the old fishermen in Theocritus. When he has learned as much as he can he launches his bark under some equivalent for the Jolly Roger, he lands at the sleeping village under cover of night, surrounds the cottage, and, as a rule, places the householder on fire, or ties him up in a sack with a pair of cats, or otherwise prevails on him to disclose the hiding place of his valuables. Then the gallant pirate sails away and it is all over.

Shadows have no claws but they have frightened many people to death.

A WELL AS A BAROMETER.

It Is on a Farm in New York, and Foretells the Weather. There is a curious well on the Flint farm, in the town of Great Valley. Cattaraugus county, says the New York Sun. It is a natural barometer. Nobody ever passes, the farm , winter or summer, if the weather is settled, without asking something like this:

"Does the well threaten a change?" For every one knows that if there is bad weather coming the well will let them know it, sure as sure can be.

They call the well up there the "whistling well," although it doesn't whistle now. But that isn't any fault of the well. This well was dug about fifty years ago by the father of Colonel Flint, who occupies the farm. He put it down forty-five feet, but found no it down forty-five feet, but found no water, and dug no further. Instead of water, a strong current of air came from the well at times. The opening was covered with a big flat stone, and for amusement a hole was drilled in the stone and a big tin whistle fitted into it. The whistle had two tones one when the air rushed up from the well, and a different one when the counter current sucked the air back into the mysterious depths. It wasn't long before the discovery was made that within forty-eight hours after the outrushing current from the well started the whistle to shricking a storm invariably followed. When the tone of the whistle was changed by the reversing of the current, it was discovered that the change meant a change and the coming of fair weather. These weather signals never failed. When the weather was settled the whistle was silent. The whistle got out of order some years ago, and for some reason was never repaired, but the coming and going currents of air prophesy the coming of their respective "spells of weather" with unvarying infallibility.

THE THICKERAYS AT ROME. Their First Dinner Proved to Be Dellclous When They at Last Procured It. About luncheon time my father sent us down to the pastry cook's shop, where we reveled among cream tarts and petits fours, and then we ordered our dinner, as people did then, from a trattoria near at hand. Then we went out again, still in our raptures, and when dinner time came, just about sunset, excitement had given us good appetites, notwithstanding the tarts, writes Anne Ritchie in Macmillan's Magazine.

We were ready, but dinner delayed. We waited more and more impatiently as the evening advanced, but still no dinner appeared. Then the English servant, Charles, was called, and dispatched to the cook's shop to make inquiry. He came back much agitated, saying that the dinner had been sent -that they assured him it had been sent. It had apparently vanished on its way up the old palace stairs. "Go back," said my father, "and tell them there is some mistake, and that we are very hungry, and waiting still."

The man left the room, then returned again with 'a doubtful look. "There was a sort of a box came an hour ago," he said. "I have not opened it, sir." With a rush my sister and I flew into the hall, and there sure enough, stood a square, solid iron box with a hinged top. It cer-tainly looked very unlike dinner, but we raised it with some faint hopes, fairy tale-roast birds and dressed meats, a loaf of brown bread and compotes of fruit, and a salad and a bottle of wine, to which good fare we immediately sat down in cheerful excitement—our first Roman family meal together.

An Eye to the Future.

Housekeeper — Considering how much I've done for you, I think you might saw some wood before you go. Tramp-I'd like to obleege yeh, mum, but think how often the wheel o' fortune turns over in this country. "What's that got to do with it?" "Everything, mum. My grandchildren might get rich, and then it would be so much pleasanter fer thim to be able to say their grandfather was a gentleman o' leisure than to have to admit he was a wood sawyer." -New York Weekly.

A Noise Reducer. A sound reducer is being introduced in Germany by J. Patrick of the Franklin metal works, and it is claimed that it entirely overcomes the noise occasioned by exhaust steam. The apparatus is applicable to all kinds of gines, pumping engines, steam, gas, and petroleum engines, while at the same time it serves the purpose of an oil and water separator.

A Terrific Shock. Mrs. Bangleton was reading of a street car accident in Chicago to her husband. "The cars ran together," she said, and Miss Wabash, who was standing in the aisle, was thrown from her feet and_' "Gee whiz!" exclaimed her husband;

"those cars must have been going a hundred miles an hour."

Abundant Game in Maine. One interesting result of the abundancy of game in Maine in recent years has been the development and cultivation of taxidermy in that state. Skilled taxidermists are now to be found in every small town on the routes that lead infrequently in remote backwoods set-

An Unusual Benediction.

A priest in Buda, Hungary, recently married a very young couple, and, instead of the usual benediction, amazed the principals and witnesses by exclaiming, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

HOLBEIN'S LAST DESCENDANT.

Romantic Fortune That Befel Illim in a Bohemian Poorhouse. The sad fate of the last descendant of Hans Holbein, the famous painter, has aroused the pity and interest of the daughter of a landed proprietor of Prussia to an unusual extent. Fridolin von Holbein, the only bearer of the great name, inherited a considerable fortune, says the New York Tribune. In the course of an adventurous life, however, he met many mishaps, made bad investments, and lost all his money. After trying to make a living in various ways, unsuccessfully, he returned to his native town, Aussig, in Bohemia, a penniless man. Old and weak he was obliged to accept quarters in the city poor house, to keep from starving. But a bright ray of hope now shines on his gray head. Fraulein Charlotte, the daughter of the landed proprietor whose large estates are near Charlottenburg, heard the story of Holbein's life, and immediately announced to her parents that she intended to marry the unfortunate man and rescue him from his miserable condition. She is 23 years old, has considerable property in her own name, and-naturally and necessary in one so romantic—is a beautiful woman. Her parents saw no objection to her plan, and a few days ago she sent her brother to Aussig as her matrimonial ambassador. Calling on the mayor of the town and explaining the nature of his errand, he was sent to Mme. Marie Wrusz, a relative of Holbein. The two then went to the poor house to visit the painter's descendent. The bearer of the brilliant name was, as might be expected pleased at the interest taken in his fate by the young woman, and quickly gave his consent. He was supplied

There is actually nothing in the flesh of the dog that is distasteful or repulsive. Lewis and Clark the explorers, who learned to eat it through compulsion, actually became fond of it in time. It is not generally known that it is a favorite article of diet among certain people, but a French paper says that the number of dogs slaughtered at the abattoirs in Munich has increased amazingly in the past few months. The taste for dog flesh is said to have been imported by Italian laborers, who have recently come in large numbers to the Bavarian capital. The meat is used not only as an adulterant for sausages, but is eaten openly, under its own name, prepared in various ways. -- New York Christian Advocate.
