The Spanish Way.

BY DON CLARK WILSON.

(Copyright, 1902, by Daily Story Pub. Co.) It was remarked at the officers' mess in the Exposition barracks that young Lieut, Fogarty was caught in the meshes of the senorita's ascinations, and that if he was not watchful of his sentiment he would some day turn traitor to his country for her sake, like the notorious Howard, and fight against Uncle Sam in the insurrecto army. But Fogarty, who once or twice overheard talk of this kind, smiled loftily and treated his little Lirtation with the senorita as a trivial affair, a matter of jest, the diversion of a gentleman-and continued the

On the Luneta, one night, when the Sixth artillery band was giving an open air concert, his eye was caught by a dark-eyed, voluptuous Spanish boauty in an open Stanhope, and he never rested until he had formed her acquaintance. Now, this was a most difficult matter to accomplish, for Spanish old world ideas of propriety and all that had to be circumvented, the haughty old padre and madre of the girl had to be reconciled to his advances, and the girl's inborn prejudice against anything and everything American had to be overcome. Then there was also an absurd fellow named Loretto Cervillo, an ex-officer of the defeated Spanish army, who claimed the senorita as his affianced.

Senorita Lola did not evince any especial affection for him; she did not give way to those bursts of Spanish passion he had read of so often in fiction; and it struck coldly on his ardor at times to taink that possibly she was trifling with him, and that her acceptance of his attentions was prompted merely and solely from a love of diversion and excitement.

One night the lieutenant left the Reserve hospital on Calle Las Vegas, and jumping into a passing carometta, drove to the Teatro Libertad, where he had an appointment with

At the entrance he paused and cast his eyes over the audience. It was a gay scene, gorgeously colored, with laughing groups at the tables and in the boxes; a gathering of Spaniards, civilians and ex-soldiers, of American officers and dark-eyed damsels here and there, of elite Filipino mestezzos and their escorts, of American soldiers in spotted khaki and limp gray hats. Lieut. Fogarty paid scant attention to all this, however; his eye anxiously sought for the pretty face of Lola, and at last he found her.

Found her seated at a table in a remote corner near some curtains, chating gaily with a dark-browed lout in sweeping panama and white duck, who sipped idly at a slendor glass of emerald liquor, and seemed wholly sour and unapproachable and disagreeable. Lola kept up a running fire of vivacious talk, and seemed entranced the more as his ill-humor increased; and as Fogarty, himself scowling blackly, quickly approached and sat opposite her, she greeted him with a delicious little bubble of laugh-

'Noches, senor teniente! I was expecting you. See-Cervillo-dear old Cervillo!"-impulsively kissing him, to Fogarty's unutterable displeasure-"is so delightfully argry! Carrejo, it | Cervillo, in a low, tense tone. is exciting!—two angry soldiers!" | or me! I care not vich!" Cervillo scowled back hatred at Fogarty. Fogarty sniffed sarcastically at Cervillo; and Lola laughed in burst of enchantment.

"Senors," she said, "It is beautiful! Teniente," to Fogarty, "will you drink?"

She poured out a glass of absinthe then tossed the lieutenant a pack of native cigarillos, and herself lighted one, which she smoked with exquisite grace and abandon.

Cervillo turned slightly away, puffing sulkily at a cigarette, and glared savagely at the dancer on the stage, as though the sight of Fogarty was

Fogarty sulkily puffed at the cigarillo, and stared into the gossiping rowd. After a silence Fogarty tossed nis cigarillo away impatiently, took e senorita's hand in his, and said:

"It is unjust of you, senorita. It is cruel. Why do you persistently torment me? Why-

"Torment you?" The little vixen's mouth dropped in surprise, but there was a twinkle in her eye that did not escape the lieutenant. "I would not knowingly-cosa! Esmeralda is gone, and now watch, teniente. It is the juggler Mezziola who comes next He is a marvelous man, so adroit!"

But what did Fogarty care for the stage when this enchanting miss sat before him? There was nothing offered the public from the proscenium to compare with what Fogarty now watched in silence, his heart burning with love. For a moment be forgot the place, the crowd, the juggler, the music-and Cervillo. His head swam, his senses whirled hazily as one bereft of reason. In an ecstacy he squeezed her hand, he bent forward, breathing heavily, and before he was fully aware of what he was doing, and before the senorita could Fogarty looked at the senorita. A strange light shone in her eyes. He interpreted it as a challenge.

"I refuse, senor,' he said; and in thrice a glove was thrown in his face, he felt a stinging slap on his cheek, and a voice hissed in his ear: "Den, you know what dis means

He did. But he chose his own way of answering the challenge. His impatience could brook no delay in seeking satisfaction. He knocked the Spaniard to the floor with one quick, straight blow, then sprang back, breathing heavily.

That was the American way. In the confusion that followed Fo-

The cochero drove across the Punta Espana, down a devious road to the aged portcullis under the wall, and then plunged into the narrow, illpaved, foul-smelling streets of darkride through this bewildering tangle ne finally pulled up before the door of a somber building in the very heart of tne old city, and in response to his "Aci, senor," the senorita, with a gay BAIN'S OLD SHOP. burst of laughter, leaped out.

"Buenos noches, teniente!" she said to the officer within. "Buenos noches!" and disappeared into the house. A ripple of laughter that did not sound exactly mirthful to the cochero floated back on the dense, close air as she swung the ponderous old door behind her.

The driver waited patiently for several moments. The officer in the cab said nothing, gave no directions, or in fact manifested any interest whatsoever in the proceedings. The co chero confidently awaited the choice cussword and the impatient "Pronto!" he was so accustomed to hear from his American fares. But it came not, and the cochero sagely concluded his fare was drunk, "Americano mucho loco," he mused, "Senor tenmusic-Paloma, it is divine!
