THE YOUNG BRIDE'S FIRST DISCOVERY

Their wedding tour had ended, and they entered their new home to settle down to what they hoped to be one long uninterrupted blissful honeymoon.

But, alas! the young bride's troubles soon begin, when she tried to reduce the cost of living with cheap big can baking powders.

She soon discovered that all she got was a lot for her money, and it was not all baking powder, for the bulk of it was cheap materials which had no leavening power. Such powders will not make light, wholesome food. And because of the absence of leavening gas, it requires from two or three times as much to raise caker or hiscuits as it does of Calumet Baking. or biscuits as it does of Calumet Baking

"I think the Cuticura Remedies are the best remedies for eczema I have ever heard of. My mother had a child who had a rash on its head when it was real young. Doctor called it baby rash. He gave us medicine, but it did no good. In a few days the head was a solid mass; a running sore. It was awful, the child cried continually We had to hold him and watch him to keep him from scratching the sore. His suffering was dreadful. At last we remembered Cuticura Reme dies. We got a dollar bottle of Cuticura Resolvent, a box of Cuticura Ointment, and a bar of Cuticura Soap. We gave the Resolvent as directed, washed the head with the Cuticura Soap, and applied the Cuticura Ointment. We had not used half before the child's head was clear and free from eczema, and it has never come back again. His head was healthy and he had a beautiful head of hair. I think the Cuticura Ointment very good for the hair. It makes the hair grow and prevents falling hair." (Signed) Mrs. Francis Lund, Plain City, Utah, Sept. 19, 1910. Send to the Potter Drug & Chem. CHAPTER XIX. (Continued.)

"Not a word or a line.

The sea was void upon the quarterwhat need to tell it. But my eyes had already detected the black outline of a ship's boat upon the starboard bow, and my very life depended upon the ruse which should divert the men's attention from it. Never shall I doubt the ruffians would have made an end of it there and then, and have murdered me as they had murdered the criminals upon the ship, if the argument had been carried but another sentence. I had seen knives unsheathed at my words, had heard the promptings at my words, had heard the promptings of rogue to rogue, that low muttering of the human beast who has scented prey, and whose nostrils are distended by the lust of it. Let the talk run on, and they would be up the ladder and upon me, cost what it might—up and on me, and their knives at my throat. This I understood, when I pointed to the port quarter and sent them gaping there in a body—as chilthem gaping there in a body—as children who are not content to hear, but with their own eyes would see,

My freedom, nay, my life depended upon the ruse. Such a fact was clear above all other. It had been no lie when I said that my friends were coming to me. Athwart the great ship, not 50 yards from the starboard bow, lay the long boat which had been sent out the long boat which had been sent out to me. I took one last look at the hud-dled forms below me, debated the pos-sibilities in one of those swift mental surveys to which long habit has trained me, and staking all upon the venture, risking every peril both of the men and risking every peril both of the men and the sea, I leaped boldly from the bridge and left the issue to the God of my destinies.

So the tragic hour began for me, and such were its circumstances! The rushing waters booming as a dirge in my ears, my clothes dragging me down as a burden insupportable; darkness and the dread sea all about me; a black sky meeting my vision as I rose gasping to the surface—no knowledge now of where the boat lay or in what direction to strike out; no certainty that my friends had seen me or were alive to my situation—nothing but silence and the long rollers carrying me, and far away a distant shouting, an echo of pistol shots, a rejoinder of strong voices and then a silence, so deep, so profound that the very wavelets were as cataracts beating at my brain. This, surely, was the moment when a man might have told himself that he was cast out utterly from man and the world, a true derelict of the vast ocean, a voice crying in a monstrous silence, a holocaust to wind and wave and the gaping sea. The deepest dungeon ashore could not have inflicted a wound of desolation so terrible.

Joan of the Valley House—who stooped and kissed my lips, and with a young girl's tears expressed the welcome by her heart unspoken.

It had been Okyada's hand which dragged me from the sea, and Larry himself had steered the boat which discovered me. Despite the fog, that lynxeyed captain of mine had dogged every movement of the Dlamond Ship, and stood so close to her, throughout the adventure, that he could sometimes have tossed a biscult to her decks. When the rabble chased me to the bridge, his keen ear had detected the commotion. He heard me leap from the ship, and guessed instantly the nature of the situation which drove me to this extremity. His express commands had kept the long boat in the sea from the beginning, and in the sea she swam when I had most need of her.

Lifting my hand, I pointed with dramatic intent to the port quarter of the ship.

CHAPTER XX.

The sea was void upon the quarter—

She exclaimed, and then—"Only a man would be so ungrateful."

"I demur to the charge. You set a great crowd of bullies on me to hold me down by violence, and then talk of ingratitude! Do you not see, my dear girl, that I must know what is going on? How can I lie here when there is so much uncertainty—when so many things may happen? Please do as I tell you, and let Captain Larry know at once."

She came and stood by my bedside, and touching my fingers for an instant with her own—a gesture which thrilled me as though some strange current of a new life burned in my veins—she

a new life burned in my veins—she id very quietly:
"There is nothing happening. Dr. in. If you went up to the bridge, u would see nothing but the fog. Ean. That is what Mr. McShanus is looking at now—at that and the punch bowl.
We cannot see the others—we shall never see them again, I hope."
It was calmly said, and yet what a tale of woe it voiced; days of her own agony among the ruffians, intolerable hours of suffering and distress I thought her then one of the bravest of thought her then one of the bravest of women—I think so to this hour.

"Joan," I said, "how did you come here? Where did Okyada find you? I have thought much about it, and I believe that I know. But you must tell me yourself. You hid in one of the boats, did you not—one of the three boats the men lowered when they wished me to go on board their ship. I thought it must be so. There was no other way." other way.

She had seated herself by this time in a girlish attitude at the foot of my bunk, her feet swinging together as though to express a sense of her indif-ference; her hands clasped, her eyes avoiding mine as though she feared I would read the whole truth therein.

"You were a wizard always, Dr. Ean. My father, that is General Fordibras, said so—Mr. McShanus thinks it, and so does Captain Larry. Yes, it was in the last of the boats that I hid myself. I saw them lower it, and then, when they all got into the first two, I climb-ed down from the gangway, and hid myself under the tarpaulin. Have you wyself under the tarpaulin. Have you ever been really afraid, Dr. Ean—afraid for an instant of something which seems to be worse than your thoughts can imagine? Well, I have been afraid like that ever since Mr. Imroth took me on the ship—afraid in a way I cannot tell you—yes, so afraid that I would lie for hours, and shut all sights and sounds from my ears, and pray that the day would find me dead. I tell you now day would find me dead. I tell you now that you may not speak to me of it again—I could not bear it, God knows I could not."

For an instant, and an instant only, her courage failed her, and burying her face in her hands she wept like a child. Herein I think she gave expression to sion to that pent-up anguish she had so long supported silently and alone. I did not seek to comfort her, did not answer a word to her piteous entreaty. The circumstances of her rescue must, in the end, be their own answer to her. in the end, be their own answer to her commands had kept the long boat in the sea from the beginning, and in the sea she swam when I had most need of her.

Rowing swiftly to the yacht, the men lough of anxious men, and the little bed own like a dog and safely in my own bed almost before I realized it. Whatever emotion agitated me was chiefly the emotion of friendship, and of the sure knowledge that Joan Fordithras was on the ship, that she moved and breathed near by me, and, with God's help, would remain my prisoner to the end of my days. For, be assured that, despite old Timothy, who roared for the rot water and the lemons in a voice that could have been heard in the truck, little Joan had taken as proud command of that cabin five minutes after I entered I, as any command at I Plymouth. Nor had anyone the right to drive her thence to take that place she occupied so gracefully. I suppose it would have been early me he new day when Joan took charge of me, and old salt in the bridge as a man full of anxieties, and yet in some sense content that it should be so. These foolish nurses of mine had so far told me mothing, nor did they hear me talking with equanimity. An immersion in the sea is often regarded by a sailor, of almen, as direcard the water as other than an enemy. So now Larry would have been early me the sea of the regarded by a sailor, of almen, as a dregard the water as other than an enemy. So now Larry would have been early mit the grade that it should be so. These foolish nurses of mine had so far told me nothing, nor did they hear me talking with equanimity. These foolish nurses of mine had so far told me nothing, nor did they hear me talking with equanimity. An immersion in the sea is often regarded by a sailor, of almen, as a conspiration of the sail principally to frighten me. Well, Joan, should not have been frightened but would be untrue to tell you that I have so much sense. There are hours when most men lose their courage. I lost mine entirely upon the night when they signalled a message concerning you. If I had been somebody else, I should have seen at once that it was mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. You, I suppose, were comfortably in your cabin sleeping meanwhile. That is generally the story—one of two in is generally the story—one of two in a frenzy of anxiety, and the other quietly sleeping. Let us say no more about it. The circumstances will never about it. The circumstances will never recur, I trust, if we live for a thousand years—an unnecessary piece of emphasis, young as my Joan is."

I had brought a smile to her face now, and she began to tell me many things about Imroth's ship which otherwise. I am convinced would never have things about Imroth's ship which otherwise, I am convinced, would never have been told at all. There were thirty-two so-called passengers on board, she said, eleven of them women—and a crew, as she heard, of fifty hands. The smallness of this did not surprise me. Here was a ship which rarely went into port, a great hulk floating in the waste of the Atlantic—what need had she of men? The fellows idled about the deck all day, as Joan confessed, and at night all day, as Joan confessed, and at night there were scenes passing all words to describe.

"We lived as you live in the great hotels in London. Ships came to us frequently from England and America, and supplied us with all that were read.

frequently from England and America, and supplied us with all that was necessary. Mr. Imroth rarely saw anyone, but the others played cards all day, with the men. When he came on quarreleo. Then at night all the cabins would be lighted up, and there would be dancing and singing and dreadful scenes until daybreak While Mr. Imroth was on the ship, I saw very little of it at all. He made me keep my cabin, and he was right to do so. When he left us, it was very different. I remember that a young Russian fell in love with me the first day I went or, deck—there were others of whom I -there were others of whom cannot speak, and moments I shall never forget. Mr. Ross was very kind but he had not Mr. Imroth's influence with the men. When he came or board, Mr. Imroth sailed for the Brazils, and the mutiny began. Some of the men wished to go ashore; there were others who would have waited for their companions who were coming out from Europe on a relief ship. Then one night the alarm was given that your yacht had arrived and was watching us. Mr. Imroth had told the men all about you, and when you were sighted. I believe they thought that there were other ships with you and that their end had come. From that night it was was one long scene of terror and bloodshed. I lived—I cannot tell you of it, Dr. Ean; you would never believe what I have seen and heard."

CHAPTER XXI.

I suppose that I slept a few hours at the dead of night; but certainly I was awake again shortly after the sun had risen, and up on the bridge with Larry, as curious a man as any in the Southern hemisphere that morning. Remember in what a situation I had left the Diamond Ship, the problems that remained unsolved upon her decks, the distress of her crew, the trials and judgments that awaited them ashore, the sure death prepared for them upon the high seas. Had we any longer a duty toward the honest men yonder—if honest men there could by any possibility be; or did other claims call us imperiously back to England and our homes, to tell the story where all the world might hear it? These were the questions that Larry and I discussed together, as we stood on the bridge that sunny morning.

And the logic of his case was, 1

desolation so terrible.

I was there within a cable's length of those who would have given their very lives for me, and yet as far away from them as though I had stood at the foot of Mount Terror and cried to the skies for my salvation. Not a sound, not a whisper of life did the wind bear to me. A strong swimmer, I lay deep in the water, the spindrift cold upon my face, the ripples of the cold upon my face, the ripples of the sky for my zenith. And how far had those minutes carried me from humanity and all human interests!

How long it was before the end ame, I shall never know. I recollect that I had the sense not to swim, but the salvance of the ripples of the salvance of it, Joan," I shall never know. I recollect that I had the sense not to swim, but the salvance of its residents. In the end, be their own answer to her fears, I thought.

"We will not speak of it, Joan," I suppose, unanswerable.

"Doctor," he said, "if your brother to bide yourself in the boat, and I wonder it occurred to you. Of course I sheuld have been disappointed if I had been wrong. Directly they told with a been wrong. Directly they told with the police? You ask me where our duty lies, and I'll tell you in a word It lies to Miss Joan first of all—to see that Okyada would find you there. That is a fellow who reads my mind more clearly than I can read it myself. He is the true wizard. We must keep Okyada always with us when we go back to the old home in England, Joan. It would not lose him for all the riches. She is now in the track of mail steamers bound to the Argentine, and the logic of his case was, I suppose, unanswerable.

"Doctor," he said, "if your brother lay dying, would you call first upon him or the son of your neighbor who had hurt himself running away from the police? You ask me where our duty lies, and I'll tell you in a word It lies to Miss Joan first of all—to see that you had jumped down into one of the neglected boats, and that Okyada would find you there. That is a fellow who reads my mind more clearly than I can read off as we are, and in many ways better She is now in the track of mail steamers bound to the Argentine, and will quickly fall in with help. If you board her again, they will cut your throat for a certainty, and try to board us when that is done. Leave them to the justice of almighty God. Their destiny is in other hands. That is wisdom and duty together."

"Sources of pollution in the vicinity of a well or spring should be noted wherever possible, and drinking water should not be drawn except at a safe distance from them. The distance required for absolute safety varies greatly with the character of the rock, For wells sunk in sandstone, slate, and shale, 100 feet may be sufficient; where the surface stratum is composed of fine sand, 200 feet should be allowed; and where it is limestone or granite much greater distances will be necesmuch greater distances will be nec sary. Water may run polluted limestone for miles, so that wells regions where limestone makes up the greater part of the surface rock should be carefully examined after rains for mud and floating matter, for these are pretty sure indications of pollution.
