The league of nations and the benefits or ills that go with it, according to the way the individual thinks about the league, promises to make the campaign this year as exciting and productive of political oratory as the famous free silver campaign issue of 1896. Even now speakers at gatherings of all kinds overlook few opportunities to talk a little politics, no matter how inappropriate the occasion. Last Sunday a minister invited to deliver a memorial address in honor of the country's soldier dead, speaking in one of the leading churches in one of Nebraska's largest towns, devoted his entire discourse to an eulogy of President Wilson as the author of peace on earth and abolishment of war. One is reminded of the funeral of the stranger in a small inland town in Kansas during the campaign of 1896. The stranger passed away, penniless, during the absence on vacation of the only minister the town afforded, and a band of kindly-hearted citizens conducted the last sad rites assisted only by the local undertaker. When the body was about to be consigned to the grave the undertaker asked if anyone present could and would make a few remarks suitable to the occasion. The members of the funeral party stirred rather restlessly and for a time no one spoke. Then a bewhiskered follower of William Jennings Bryan, who was in politics in those days too, according to ancient history, cleared his throat and huskily remarked that if no one else cared to speak he would like to talk a little on the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and the stranger was consigned to the grave to the tune of sixteen to one.

You'd have called it a Midsummer Night's Dream—if anyone had told you a few years ago that a man might dress right smartly in the torrid dog-days, and still look and feel cool and comfortable. But that's a Midsummer Night's Reality today—a Midsummer high noon Reality too—let old Sol do his blazing worst. These fifteen Mohairs, shown on Pages 6, 8 and 10, are as good looking and as adaptable to fine tailoring as any full-weight worsted. But they're as light as a gentle Zephyr; and as cool as a miser to his poor relations.
