

Doctor Cupid

That love sometimes cures disease is a fact that has been called to the attention of the public by a prominent physician. Love is not, however, the cure for all women. Irritable, a woman is nervous and miserable, feels dragged down and worn out for no reason that she can think of.

Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription gives new life and new strength to weak, worn-out, run-down women. "Favorite Prescription" makes weak women strong and sick women well. It is now sold by all druggists in the United States in tablets as well as liquid form.

BLAIR, NEBR.—"I think Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription a fine tonic for girls as well as grown women. My daughter was in an extremely nervous condition and suffered with irregularity. Just a half bottle of the 'Prescription' cured her of both the nervousness and other trouble and proved to be an excellent tonic besides.

"Several months afterwards, I was in a very nervous state and the half bottle of 'Prescription' that my daughter had left I took and found it just as efficient as in her case."—Mrs. L. H. LOTHROP, 211 E. Lincoln St.

Documentary Evidence. A Washington mother was not particularly pleased by the willingness of her daughter to proceed upon various excursions with a young man from another city.

"I would much prefer," said mother, "that you would not go sailing with that young man, Marie; I don't believe he knows a thing about a sailboat."

"Oh, but he does, mother!" was the quick response. "He showed me a letter of recommendation from a firm for which he worked, and they speak very highly indeed of his salesmanship."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Corresponding Clue. "The police seemed to know the fellow by his gait." "Why shouldn't they? He's a fence."

A bad back makes a day's work twice as hard. Backache usually comes from weak kidneys, and if headaches, dizziness or urinary disorders are added, don't wait—get help before the kidney disease takes a grip—before dropsy, gravel or Bright's disease sets in. Doan's Kidney Pills have brought new life and new strength to thousands of working men and women. Used and recommended the world over. Ask your neighbor!

A South Dakota Case. August Wachholz, retired farmer, Salem, S. D., says: "A cold settled in my kidneys. They became weak and my back ached. The kidney secretions passed irregularly. I was told about Doan's Kidney Pills being good and decided to try them. Doan's relieved me in a short time. I hadn't used them long before I was entirely over the trouble."

No Court of Appeal for Judge. A great many folks in the District of Columbia do not know the judges of the Supreme court, hence these dignitaries sometimes are treated just like other mortals.

Recently Justice McReynolds started to board the front end of a street car, and the motorman, who had opened the front door merely to talk to a friend, shouted:

"Hey, there, you; don't try to get on this front platform! Go back to the rear!"

The justice calmly obeyed the order of the higher court, the motorman muttered, clanged his bell viciously and the car passed on.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Economic Partition of Turkey.

From the New York Times. The division of the remnant of Turkey into spheres of British, French and Italian economic influence is, in a way, a frank partition of the spoils of war in regions where self-determination, if it could be invoked at all in the case of the Turk, would give little support to a scheme like this. But citizens of a nation (the United States) which had the opportunity to reorganize this part of the Near East pretty much as it pleased can hardly avert the moral eye if others take up the work after our refusal.

We might have done it better, but we would not do it at all. British, French and Italian diplomats are going about it in the only way they know. For Anatolia and the regions to the east comprise some districts of great natural wealth, which will never be developed if left to the Turk. Germany was beginning to develop them before the war, and the present partition is evidently inspired by a long look ahead to a time when Germany or Russia might be in a position to do the work and turn what is left of Turkey against the western powers. A good argument could be made in justification of the arrangement on the ground of self-defense.

Whether practical good will come of it is another matter. Doubtless there is great wealth awaiting development. The French sphere includes Cilicia and southern Kurdistan, then, is to remain autonomous, or, as the agreement puts it, "eventually" independent. This represents the residue of the extensive French spheres outlined in the Sykes-Picot agreement of 1916. The oil fields of Mosul have faded out of the picture; by some process which the French public still finds it hard to understand, they have been swallowed up in Mesopotamia.

In what is left to France there is considerable mineral wealth; there is also a population of which the Armenian part leans toward the French when French troops are at hand as a protection against the Turks. When the Armenians have to shift for themselves, as they have had to do lately, there is no particular love for France among them. The Turks have fought the French or made truces according to their conveniences and that of General Gouraud, who also has the Arabs of Syria on his hands. But a nucleus of enthusiasts for the French connection, such as exists in Syria, is not there.

The French sphere of influence means that for some years to come considerable bodies of troops will have to be maintained in these parts of the Near East. For the next few years, at any rate, the French sphere will cost more than it is worth. Italy will get the valuable coal mines of Herakleia, which the Italians need. An Italian concession for their exploitation was one of the earliest ideas raised at the peace conference as compensation for the surrender of the Dodecanesus to Greece. There is little to be said against this part of the arrangement except that in the present state of feeling in Asia Minor the Italians, too, are likely to have to maintain considerable overseas garrisons at a time when Italian public sentiment is cold to such enterprises.

The agreement specifies the French and Italian spheres of influence, and Paris draws the inference that England is to take everything that is left. But this, too, is an expensive acquisition. Half the British people seem to be disposed to cut loose from Mesopotamia, oil wells and all; it costs too much to carry the overhead charges. The residue which presumably will fall under British economic influence can be separated generally into three great divisions—that which it at present held by the Greeks, that which is controlled by the faction of Mustafa Kemal, and Kurdistan. The British need Kurdistan as a strategic protection for Mesopotamia, but any very heavy expenditure on the country is unthinkable. Mustafa Kemal and his party are still virtually at war with England, and nothing could be done in their mountainous fastnesses without some preliminary fighting that would be hard and costly.

There is left that part of western Anatolia which was reconquered by the Greeks in the early summer. That campaign was carried on with British assistance, and the political relations between England and Greece are excellent just now. If Venizelos remains in power, those relations will continue. But this is a matter of economic development. The territories liberated by the Greek armies are those where the Greek population is most numerous. Once freed from the Turk, the Greeks will probably look after most of the economic development of the country themselves. British capital can be put to work, but beyond that Britain will probably find little profit. It looks as if the great powers are undertaking a work that will require heavy investments of men and money that cannot well be spared, and that it will be a long time before they begin to get any return.

PIGEON IS CLEVER AND IS RESPECTABLE

From New York Sun. An ornithologist has been studying the flight of pigeons. He says: "The domestic pigeon is such a familiar sight in our streets that we don't half appreciate its beauty and cleverness. It fits in military formation, evidently following a supremely skillful leader or stunt. The flock, sometimes 40 or 50 strong, maneuvers as a unit, constantly attacking more difficult evolutions.

"First, they will practise the joyous and dizzy curves, full of unexpected twists, in which an occasional unwary one becomes a straggler from the flock, at a great height above the city. Then suddenly their indistinguishable leader will sweep them down to the dangerous vicinity of roofs and chimneys and lead them through a mazy obstacle race, which must make the brains of the young birds dizzy. I don't know whether a pigeon is ever dashed to death against brickwork or masonry but such is the peril that faces the weaklings of those grueling tests of efficiency.

"The pigeon has other important claims on our respect. For instance, he marries one wife only, and if she behaves herself he lives with her happily for a lifetime. He helps her build the nest, hatch the eggs and feed the young. During the breeding season he and she secrete a milky fluid in their crops to moisten the food they give to their babies. They are vegetarians, they are peaceable, intelligent and resourceful; in fact, if you remembered all their virtues you'd never eat roast squab again."

Accidents to Children. From the Springfield Union. Official records showing that no fewer than 15,000 children were killed by accidents in the United States in the year 1919 emphasize the need of more attention campaigning along the lines of public safety. Most of all is educational work among the children themselves a prime necessity, as so many of them, through heedlessness, invite the accidents of which they are victims. Playing in roadways where automobile traffic is heavy is one prolific source of such accidents, and crossing the streets without looking to the right or left to see if the way is clear is another. Parents and school teachers could do much to lessen the number of accidents due to these causes by constantly impressing the minds of their children the danger of such practices.

Woolen Mills in the West. From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. Secretary Mayes of the marketing bureau of the state board of agriculture has called attention to the anomalous condition in the woolen industry. There are millions of pounds in storage in Missouri, he says, but the blankets we buy are made in New England. We have no facilities for turning our wool into cloth or yarn. The whole wool-growing west, he declares, has surrendered to "Boston, the Wall Street of Wool," and, in consequence, is at the mercy of the East's dictation. The remedy he proposes is simple. Missouri and the west must get into the business of manufacturing wool. He suggests that custom mills should be established here, such as are operated on the Atlantic coast, to which the farmer can send his wool, to be converted into thread, or some other product, on a mutually satisfactory basis. There should also be scouring mills throughout the entire West where wool can be graded and put into salable form. The western wool grower, apparently, is in much the same position as the southern cotton planter as regards having little or nothing to say about the price of his product. But the south is gradually becoming a cotton manufacturing territory. Its development in that line has admittedly been slow, but the economic advantages of the plan are widely recognized and widely agitated, until today there is scarcely a community of any size in the south but dreams of cotton-mills.

There is no good reason, of course, why the west that grows wool should not manufacture wool. New England has no vested rights in the west's wool or the south's cotton. As a matter of fact, there is a lot of waste motion in the superfluous freightage of the present arrangement. And such waste motion is peculiarly intolerable in view of our inadequate transportation and high freight rates. It is not in the interest of wool growers, solely that the west manufacture its wool. It is to the interest of us all that this logical evolutionary step be taken, because we should all profit from it.

Egypt's Autonomy. From the Montreal Star. Zaghlul Pasha is not satisfied. He has traveled from Cairo to Paris and from Paris to London to tell the world of the benefits that are to accrue to Egypt under the settlement formulated by Lord Milner "will not satisfy Egyptian nationalist ambitions." Yet Egypt has been given a larger share of autonomy than any other nation since the slogan of self-determination was trumpeted at the peace conference. The great war affected the destinies of Egypt more than those of any non-combatant country. The khedivate, a nominal viceroyalty under the suzerainty of Britain, came to an end on December, 1914, with the abandonment of the suzerainty and the declaration of a British protectorate. Yet the principle was maintained of supporting a Mohammedan ruler on a Mohammedan throne. The new sultan was aided by a legislative assembly that was partly elective and partly nominated. The veto of the high commissioner was retained, but the assembly had power to initiate legislation. Egypt acknowledged the new regime as an improvement on the old, but the cry of "Egypt for the Egyptians" was yearly more clamorous. The nationalists were uncompromising. They demanded the withdrawal of the army of occupation and the substitution of native Egyptians for Europeans in every branch of state service. Their demands met with a most generous response from the commission that went to Egypt under Lord Milner to study their problems. Egypt was even given the right of controlling her own foreign affairs and appointing her own diplomatic representatives. It was agreed that the army of occupation should be withdrawn within a stipulated period, although a small British force was to be retained to guard the Suez canal. But Britain demanded a "special position" so far as the Sudan was concerned, and it is on this matter that the nationalists have chosen to quarrel. Britain agrees to guarantee Egypt against external aggression, but she is unwilling to abandon a country for the peace of which she has shed so much blood and treasure during the last 48 years.

Chickens Eat Boll Weevil. Morgan Stultz, a farmer, has solved the boll weevil question, and instead of the weevil being a menace to him it has been the means of declaring dividends. Early in the summer, when the weevil first appeared, Mr. Stultz had a patch of only eight acres of cotton. He immediately moved his chickens to the center of his cotton field and there constructed a temporary chicken house. He allowed the chickens to run in his cotton and they have eaten the boll weevils. He has averaged 25 dozen eggs per week since that time. His cotton crop will make four bales and he figures the weevil really helps him. Sometimes So. From the New York Globe. Few Mothers Welcome the Time When Their Boys Go Out Into the Hard World.

Almost every mother keeps her boy in "knee pants" just as long as she can; she hates to see him becoming a man, for she feels that he is getting away from her.

A mother sees only with reluctance the boy pass from the love and care and peace with which she has surrounded him, out into the world of pitiless endeavor in which he must play his part.

The mother's selfish fondness discloses itself in the ludicrous child's garment and the worn-out, home-bred horse with which she sends forth the would-be knight. These are to the modern analytical mind painfully symbolic of the unconscious interference on the part of parents with the proper adult equipment of their children for an independent life. Their apparent fondness conceals the unconscious wish that the child will find himself un-equipped for the greater world and compelled to turn back to the shelter.—New York Medical Journal.
