The propagation of Chinese pheasants for the stocking of Holt county with these noted game birds is being tried out by local enthusiasts. The birds are furnished by the state fish and game department, which recently acquired six thousand birds for distribution. Chief Game Warden Geo. Koster came up with a load of the birds in the state fish car, Angler, Monday afternoon over the North-western. Three consignments were left here, one consisting of a cock and four hens being released on the J. P. Gallagher farm just east of the city, a cock and two hens on the Tom Gallagher ranch north of the city. Other consignments will be received in a few weeks. The birds propagate rapidly, raising two broods of about twenty each every year. They are slightly larger than a prairie chicken and much speedier awing and aloft. They are protected by the state law and hunters are requested to abstain from shooting them. If the birds are given the least bit of a chance they will increase sufficiently in a few years to assure a practically unlimited supply of game to supplant the prairie chicken and grouse, now fast disappearing.
