She Called Him
"The Brute"
By MORRIS SCHULTZ
(©, 1923, Western Newspaper Union.)

KEMBLE walked out of the specialist's office with a feeling of extraordinary elation. All his troubles had suddenly disappeared under the effect of that unexpected verdict.
He walked out into the sunshine and took his way homeward. The brute was thinking of a lot of things but principally about May. Would she be glad or sorry? He knew May would not sorrow over much if he were to die. He and May had been married five years, and those five years had been the unhappiest portion of his life.

The brute, May called him, but he had never been physically brutal to her. They had simply failed to agree.
They were the type of people who ought never to have married. That was what the trouble was.
They had loved each other in the beginning, and at first they had striven so hard to come to some sort of understanding; but when they found that was impossible they had ceased to care, and had gone on their way in bland indifference to each other. Sometimes Kemble had wondered whether May was capable of loving at all. She was so detached, so like an automaton, she cared for nothing outside her housework.

He reached his home at last, and the sight of it struck him queerly, as if it had been something that he had never seen before. The furniture looked strange, and he watched May as if she had been a strange woman.
"Did you see the doctor, Howard?" He nodded.
"What did he say was the matter with you?"
"Oh, nothing much," answered The Brute.
"It isn't serious?"
"No."

And he thought for a moment that a flash of regret passed over her face, quickly masked by the usual indifferent expression. And he wondered what she would do if he were to die. He would at least leave her comfortably provided for. Probably she would marry again very speedily. Some man would marry her for her money. And then, probably, May would realize that he had not been quite such a brute after all.

Had it been disappointment that he was going to get well after all? During the following days the constraint between them seemed to deepen. Once or twice The Brute caught sight of tear stains on May's face. He was sorry, for he was really a soft-hearted brute, though May had never realized that. She had never tried to understand him.
How did it come about that May left that letter she had been writing unsealed? She trusted The Brute!
That thought flashed through his mind and made him proud. She trusted him not to read the unsealed note lying in her blotting pad when she had gone out shopping. She did not think him a dishonorable brute, then—simply a brute.

And if he read it, it was only because just now he felt an overwhelming desire to know something more of the workings of May's mind. That justified him in his own as he drew the letter out of its enclosure.
But the reading of it came to The Brute as a staggering shock. It was, in fact, a love letter, and written to a man whom The Brute knew very well.
It was written to Brampton. But it had never entered his mind that May and Brampton could possibly be in love with each other.
"And so, darling," The Brute read, "there seems no chance of future happiness for us. His illness, on which we built such hopes, is not a serious one. He and I will continue to live together, and quarrel with each other—you know what a brute he is—and we shall grow old and faded, and you and I can never be anything more to each other than we are now. It breaks my heart, dearest, to have to write to you like this, but there you are!"

The Brute put the missive carefully back in its enclosure and stood for a while in thought. He felt strangely happy to think that May had found some one whom she could love. He was happy that she had that need of love. He looked out of the window and saw her coming up the street. She looked attractive, she was still in her prime; yes, she and Brampton could be very happy together.

And The Brute rejoiced with all his heart that he had not told her, that he would never tell her that the specialist had given him two months of life and then a sudden death.

$30,000,000 Annually From Nebraska's Milk Pail

At nightfall, slowly wending their way homeward, down the lanes of Nebraska's farms, come half a million cows.

Nebraska's milk cows add some $30,- 000,000 annually to the state's wealth through the production of about 200,000,- 000 gallons of milk, from which are made about 65,000,000 pounds of butter, 2,600,- 000 gallons of ice cream, 600,000 pounds of cheese and about 5,000,000 pounds of condensed milk. During the past three years the number of milk cows in Nebraska has increased about 15 per cent.

All of Nebraska's industries are growing and this requires more and more telephone service. At the present rate that Nebraska is growing, the Bell System must spend about three-fourths of a million dollars annually for new local and long distance telephone property in this state.

The growing demand for telephone service requires vast sums of money from investors to furnish new telephone facilities.
Nearly half a million people have already purchased Bell System stock or bonds.
We shall be pleased to have you as an investor in the business. Ask our Manager or any telephone employee for full information about Bell stock or bonds.

As Nebraska prospers, the telephone is successful. Therefore, we constantly strive to provide reliable telephone service at the lowest possible charges consistent with reasonable wages to employees and a fair return on the money invested in the business.

Real News Paramount

In the country newspaper, sensations, scandals—the recording of human misery—is almost taboo. At least it certainly is secondary to the printing of real news about people and things.

For the province of the country paper—your Home Town Paper —is to give community interests first place, printing the more or less sensational personal items only when necessary to keep faith with subscribers who pay for ALL the news.

Therefore, your Home Town Paper can give you, in full measure and overflowing, 100 per cent pure news about the people in whom you are interested—your relatives and friends of the Old Home Town.
