(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

TOHN GRESHAM came into his place of business like a hurricane. His lowering brow suggested the thunder cloud. The girl at the "Information" desk stared at him in open-mouthed wonder. Diggs, the office boy, ten minutes late and just hanging up his cap, tried to fade away from view. He was halted by a stern peremptory challenge.

"Late, are you? Don't repeat it!" Diggs wilted. Over behind the railing Ned Warner, bookkeeper, started, stared hard at his relative and employer.

"I want it understood here and now," fairly shouted Mr. Gresham, "I won't have anybody in my service who appears here for work jaded and worn out with late hours. I'm watching things-look out!"

As he slammed the door noisily after him a young man sped quickly to the side of Ina.

"Oh, Arthur!" she gasped faintly, "what does it all mean?" "I can't tell you," replied Arthur Gresham rapidly. "I never saw father in such a mood before." "Perhaps he has heard aboutabout-"

"About our engagement?" interrupt-24.62 ed Arthur. "I think not. But he soon 29.69 61.35 will." 83.19

"You—you are going to tell him?" "I've done it already-by letter. I just left it on his desk. Ina, for mercy's sake hurry in there, quick! Get that letter. It's no time, the present, for father to read it. I'll be less cowardly and go to him openly when he's out of this tantrum."

"Oh, I fear! I fear!" trembled poor Ina, but she went to the private of-9.03 fice.

"Huh! looking for anything?" demanded Mr. Gresham, so flercely that her heart sank. "Why, I-I was looking for a-a letter." "That it?" challenged Mr. Gresham, and he held up a missive just opened. "Well, I've read it. You had better leave here at the end of the month."

Arthur was in business for himself. Not so Ned Warner. If Mr. Gresham was proud of his strong, manly, independent son, he also loved Ned Warner. The latter was the son of his dearest friend. On his deathbed Mr. Gresham had promised to care for him. That morning Mr. Gresham had 8.15 learned of his being seen with a gay young card-playing and drinking crowd. This was the cause that morn-1.20 ing of his unusual spell of temper. 18 24.42

A dark cloud seemed to hang over the office all that day. Mr. Gresham remained in his office until noon. He walked out of the place then, his grim silence adding new uneasiness to his anxious watchers.

Ina, pale and sad-looking, was starting to leave the office for lunch when 4.12 Ned approached her in the antercom. 33.82 "Can I have a word with you, Miss 17.92 Vaile?" he inquired. "You have been 6.51 a good friend to me," he said with sin-1.63 cerity and humility. "I am in deep distress and I feel that I must make a confidant of you. I am responsible for the trouble here this morning, I am 47.36 with true sisterly sympathy.

"Well, I am I because the "I did not know that," replied Ina,

"Well, I am. I have been a foolish. 27.04 disloyal fellow to the kindest man that ever lived, Mr. Gresham, and he 12.53 knows it. Oh! my sins are not very 5.53 heavy, but I have wasted time, gone with riotous companions and other-Blk. Amt. wise disappointed him. He was hinting at me when he burst out so this morning," and Ned, with honest tears of contrition in his eyes, told Ina the whole story, ending up with: "For the sake of you others I guess I had better go somewhere and make a man of myself."

"You will do nothing of the sort!" declared Ina. "There is too much good in you to throw yourself away. Go .41 straight to Mr. Gresham, tell him all 1.32 you have told me, turn over a new leaf and make him happy."

"I'll do it, and I'll reform, I vow I will!" cried Ned earnestly. It was late in the day when Ina timidly entered the room of her employer, little dreaming of how favorably Ned Warner had paved the way for a gracious reception. "Mr. Gresham," she said, "I have decided not to wait until the end of the month, but leave today." "Why, hadn't you better stay for a few days? My wife will be back from the country Thursday, and then between you there can be arrangements made." "For what?" gasped the perplexed Ina.

"Why, I supposed you would be glad to have her co-operation as to the trousseau and the wedding arrangements-"

"Why!" gasped the petrified Ina, "didn't you discharge me this morning?"

"What's that? Me? Ha, ha! ho, ho! Bless me, my dear young lady! What ever put that into your head? I simply suggested that, as you are going to become our daughter, it was best that you exchange office life for the home. Yes, indeed-just so!"

And, despite the fact that he was not entirely telling the truth, there was such a kind, fatherly look in his good-natured eyes that Ina did not have the heart to gainsay him,
