May Help Railroad But Will Be Rough on Owners of Securities

From the Minneapolis Journal
The Milwaukee road, once one of the sourdest and most profitable railroads of the west, now finds it necessary to effect a complete financial reorganization by means of a receivership. Out of this process will eventually issue a new Milwaukee, shorn of a mountain of obligations, and ready to engage in railroading on a sound and businesslike basis. But that will mean losses to the scattered holders of its securities. It is they who will pay for the rejuvenation of the Milwaukee. They have been somewhat prepared for this overturn by the steady decline in the quotations of their securities, as the day approached when forty-five million dollars had to be found somewhere, and nowhere to find it. But these losses of capital invested in supposedly sound securities mean many individual hurts. It is explained that the Milwaukee has had a long run of bad luck, beginning with the transcontinental extension and aggravated by the war and government mismanagement. But other well managed railroad properties have weathered the war and government operation successfully and are now on the upgrade to steady prosperity. So it comes back, for the Milwaukee, to the 2,000-mile transcontinental extension. That was badly planned and badly executed. It ought to have tapped new and unserved territory as far as possible. Instead its projectors chose to parallel existing lines for hundreds of miles. At the western end they might have opened a new route through Central Oregon, where there were no railroads and where the country is susceptible of rich development, just as James J. Hill developed the new territory through which he built the Great Northern coast extension. But instead a competing line was built, which had to share traffic with established lines, and which runs through much territory that is not productive and probably never will be. Nor was the financing of the extension soundly managed. The work was expensively done and these costs, of course, were translated into securities on which charges had to be earned. Now there is nothing for it but the heroic expedient of a receivership. The treatment is painful for the security holders, but it will effect a cure for the road.

"Sir," said the tramp, "I've walked a long way to see you, because people told me you were kind to poor fellows like me."
"They said that, did they?"
"Yes, sir. That's why I've called."
"Oh, and are you going back the same way?"
"Then, in that case, just contradict it, will you? Good day!"
"Yes, sir."

A reasonable figure for the sparking voltage under average conditions in an aircraft engine at full power at sea level is 6,000 volts; under extreme conditions it may rise to 10,000 or fall to 3,000.

Geologists Often Err.

From the Montana Oil Journal.
Can anyone respect the judgment or honesty or integrity of a geologist who will advance the theory that a manmade theoretical state line can establish for the Almighty the location of oil pools?
There are geologists who stood on the Wyoming border a few years ago and staked their judgment and professional reputation on the statement that no oil would be found in Montana.
There are today geologists in both Montana and Wyoming who are shaking their heads about the possibility of finding oil in the Dakotas. The Black Hills uplift on the southwest side is producing oil in Wyoming. Yet they shake their heads about the possibility of finding oil on the other side of the Black Hills uplift, because they are in South Dakota. If the men who made the state lines had made Wyoming include all of Montana and western South Dakota, the value of the entire area for prospecting would be doubled and trebled, under this commonly propounded theory.
The geologists who made the wise cracks about Montana are now devoting their time and attention to South Dakota which has deeper drilling and where it is more difficult to call the lies.
The same theory applies on the Pacific coast. There are hair-brained individuals who decry attempts to find oil in Oregon and Washington, convinced that all the oil west of the Rocky mountains is cooped up in 100,000 acres of oil lands in the state of California. Similar structural conditions, similar sands, similar strata, even similar topographical

A SPECIAL PLEA

By Jean O'Brien.
Give me the sun, and sometimes, rain.
Give me the moon, and snow;
Give me a friend to show me Love,
And give me then—a foe.
Give me desire unsatisfied;
And sometimes—full delight;
Give me still watches in the dark,
And then—deep sleep—at night.
Give me not too much sweetness,
lest I know satiety;
Give me—all things that make a LIFE—
Chiefly—variety.

features are extant in Washington. Were these same structures surrounded by the California line they would be pounced upon by greedy operators who are willing to pay $100 an acre for lands with half as good prospects, within the present confines of California.

"Heart-Easing Things."
And they shall be accounted poet-kings
Who simply tell the most heart-easing things.
—Keats.

Is there anyone who sings
In our day heart-easing things?
Such the Graces and the Hours
Bringing simple fruits and flowers
Down a bowery aisle of trees,
As in some old dancing frieze,
Would such delicacies please?
No! Our tastes ask subtleties;
In the wholesome meadow bloom,
Poison find, with rank perfume;
Know that greenwood shade conceals
Ill, not crushed by woman's heel!
Innocence?—the mask for Gull,
Plunge the dagger to the hilt!
Let the altar wine be spilt—
All old shrines be now unbuild!
Listen not, if any cry
"Comfort me!" Let that go by;
No heart-easing thing they tell
Who Today's harsh chorus swell,
Faith—or legend—they are gone;
Know you not that they are done?
—Edith M. Thomas, in New York Times.

An ideal stream for the lazy or impatient fisherman, who craves nourishment rather than the thrill of the catch, has been discovered by interior department engineers in the inaccessible, turbid San Juan river, one of the main tributaries of the Colorado in Utah. The swiftly flowing San Juan, called Pawhuska (mad water) by the Navajo Indians who live nearby, never gets clear and sometimes it carries three times as much silt as water. At times the river runs with a smooth, oily movement like that of molten metal. At such times the fish become exhausted and flounder on the surface, their dorsal fins projecting into the air. Then the fisherman needs only to arm himself with a club and wade cautiously into the mud to catch a fish with bare hands after he has stunned it
