BRICK BATS.

A wondrous chance had Hiram Prout, when starting life's long trail; for better men one long would scout through city, town and dale. For real success he set his start, and he was well prepared; his friends said he would travel far, he was the kind that dared. But when the seasons came and passed without a grand success, and Hiram had no fortune massed for his old age to bless, he still stepped out and spent his kale for parties wild and wet; his social friends he ne'er did fail, they kept him well in debt. When other men were moving up, his station drifted low; it was a gall and wormwood cup, as those who slip must know. He wondered why his dismal fate, why he was far behind; why creditors swung on his gate, why justice was so blind. At last he saw a gleaming light, the secret he had found; he took the new trail to the right, today his "rep" is sound. He has learned that life is sad and full of sighs and groans for those who fall for every fad—just keeping up with Jones.—Brick Smith.
