Quality Eggs Best Prices and Profits Wait on Care in Production, Grading and Handling

Many poultry producers read the daily quotations for eggs and often wonder why they do not receive the top prices as quoted. The answer is simple—in order to receive top market prices, eggs must be of the highest quality. It is an interesting fact but nevertheless true that normally produced eggs through improper handling and care are often anything but top quality.

There again a regular system of hatching and shutting up broodflocks every night should be followed. This latter practice will not only result in higher quality eggs but will make it easier to break up the broody hens and get them back to laying condition more quickly.

Another factor which is of material influence in egg quality is the density or thickness of the albumen. This is now being conducted with reference to the secret by means of which nature arranges the glucose molecule in the formation of cellulose.

or white. It is a fact that eggs laid during the summer when the hens are running on a luxuriant heavy green pasture, where they eat lots of green feed, have whites that have a tendency to become thin and watery. This condition is easily discerned before the candle.

Other factors which relate to egg quality and the price of which the producer receives are size of egg, cleanliness and soundness of shell. The market is demanding more and more and is paying a premium for good sized eggs.

This means large nests, an abundance of them and plenty of clean, dry nesting material. Eggs slightly soiled can be cleaned but egg shells which are stained coming in contact with poultry manure will never be satisfactorily cleaned.

The question of egg quality is one of the most important ones confronting the average poultry keeper. It is a difficult one to solve with price received for the products and resulting profit that unless one continually studies these problems and tries to produce and market eggs of the highest possible quality he will never be really satisfied with the price he is getting for his production.

is now being conducted with reference to the secret by means of which nature arranges the glucose molecule in the formation of cellulose. This mysterious process of plant life was partially solved when experiments revealed the physico-chemical change which takes place in the conversion of cotton fiber into mercerized silk.

The tremendous strength of cellulose fibers, which the glucose molecule is the essence, makes it a highly important tool in the hands of the manufacturer, who has been able to employ it in hundreds of useful ways without knowing the secret of its chemical composition.

By means of exhaustive experiments and studies these scientists have determined fairly well what disposition the molecule assumes in the wall structure of cellulose. What force of nature it is that brings the molecules into that particular arrangement, and whether that arrangement can be produced by some artificial method offers a vast field of inquiry and research.
