the authority conferred upon him by the sugar control act, the Secretary has therefore increased the total of all sugar quotas from 6,535,088 to 6,632,516 short tons for the current year.

But in estimating sugar consumption did Secretary Wallace allocate the increase to the beetsugar states? He did not. The beet sugar quota for continental United States remains the same in 1936 as it was in 1935. Busy Bees Gather Pollen,

Sip Sweets at Same Time

Among nature's many unique ways of doing different things is her method of effecting the pollination of different plants. Some plants, it is true, carry out this process without any outside aid whatever, others use the winds as their agents, while still others are completely powerless to help themselves even with the aid of the wind. Probably the most common of this type is white clover, says Pathfinder Magazine. One of nature's cleverest plans is carried out before our eyes without our being aware of it. Having omitted from the structure of this plant any means by which it can cross pollinate its own blooms nature provides a faithful agent. Most of such work is carried on by the bee. The blooms, having a substance which the bee desires for food, attract the bee to them. In the course of getting his food he performs the required service for the plant. Coming in contact with the stamens of one bloom small grains of pollen adhere to his body and are then carried to other blooms.

In tests to determine what amount of this work was done by insects two equal sized patches of white clover were chosen. One was surrounded with screen to prevent the entrance of any insects and the other was left entirely open. At the end of the season the enclosed patch yielded five shriveled seeds as compared to the 50,000 healthy ones yielded by the open patch.

Hedgehog and Porcupine

Are Entirely Different A common error is to confuse the hedgehog and the porcupine. The hedgehog is by no means the same, although there are similar characteristics. The hedgehog is a small animal, the largest being about the size of a large rat. They do have spines mixed in with the fur on their back and those so protected by nature, roll up in balls when attacked, after the manner of a porcupine. They feed largely on insects, mice and eggs. About nineteen varieties are known to exist in Great Britain, Europe and Asia.

The porcupine of the North American continent is a far larger animal, weighing as much as 35 and 40 pounds. Their quills or spines cover the head and back and the tall as well.

The porcupine is largely a vegetarian, feeding on bark and certain leaves. As food it is considered highly appetizing and in most sections it is considered a boon to hunters. It affords a food reserve for those unfortunate enough to be lost without ammunition. The porcupine seldom hurries and when approached by an enemy rolls up with a sense of security. It is easily killed with a club and for that reason hunters are inclined to let the porcupine live excepting in cases of emergency.-Washington
