Uneducated Sally

"THERE'S going to be a little dance of the College Women's club next Wednesday, Sally," Rita called excitedly over the telephone. "And I wanted to know whether your brother Tom and that nice friend of his that's staying with him could come."
"I'll ask them," Sally promised politely but without much enthusiasm.
"There's a dear," cried Rita. "And do try to get them to come because nice men are so scarce. I'd love to ask you, too, dear, only not belonging to the College Women's club, of course, you can't come. I'm awfully sorry, dear—"
"Nothing to be sorry for," assured Sally. "Good-by."

Sally conveyed the invitation to her brother Tom and Martin Gage, who was spending a week with him. They had both graduated from college in June and Tom was spending a few weeks of forced idleness before the really good position which he had secured in an engineer's office was ready for him. Martin Gage, whose patrimony made working for a living not a real necessity, was idling two months of the summer.

"I suppose we might as well accept," said Tom. "I don't suppose you're invited, Sally? Oh, well, you'll see more than you want of us before that time."

"Why isn't Sally invited?" asked Martin Gage bluntly.
"Because she doesn't belong," said Tom.

"Don't let's go without Sally," said Martin. "Why doesn't she belong?"

"Because I'm uneducated," laughed Sally. "Naturally they don't ask any girls that don't belong to the club, and naturally you can't belong to the club unless you're a college graduate."

MARTIN GAGE would have made further protest but for the unannounced appearance of Rita in the living room.

"Hello, Sally," she said, looking around with a smile and a toss of her short golden hair. "Door was open so I came in. Of course, you're coming to our dance?" she said confidently to the boys, and then going across the room to Sally, and laying a hand on her shoulders. "My dear, I had to come right straight over. I knew by your tone I had offended you." Her voice was lowered, but not enough to make it inaudible to Tom and Martin. "It's not your fault that you didn't go to college. Besides lots of girls aren't cut out for that sort of thing. You're only twenty—you might have an opportunity yet. I don't know what I said—but I just know you were peevish. It isn't our fault that we've had educational advantages."

Somehow Tom managed to change the subject.

But Wednesday night when Tom and Martin Gage went to the College Women's club dance Sally did feel a species of dejection. Martin protested to the last that he did not want to go.

"I really think Sally was annoyed," Martin told Tom. "But I don't see why she should be. She didn't want to go to college or she would have gone. A girl as clever as Sally is would have found it a cinch."

"That's just it," said Tom, a trifle embarrassed himself. "There wasn't enough money for both of us to go through college—and Sally made up her mind that I should have the advantage. She felt that it was more important for a boy than a girl, and in a way I suppose she was right. I made up my mind I'd make up to her later."

"AND to think that that stupid Rita talked the way she did," stormed Martin. "It makes me boil."

A week later when Martin Gage was about to terminate his sojourn with Tom he found Sally alone reading in the garden under the lilac hedge.

"I want to marry you," he told her. "I don't know whether you'll have me. Perhaps you don't feel as I do about it."

"I think I love you," Sally said, "and I think I'll marry you—if you want me to." There was quite a long silence in which Martin respectfully stroked Sally's hand. "At first when you came I knew I liked you, but then Rita seemed to be so taken with you and you went to the dance and—well, I decided that I was too uneducated for you. I wasn't going to stand in the way of you and Rita. Then I heard what you said to Tom about college women. I really couldn't help hearing. And then I knew that you probably wouldn't want to marry Rita anyway and that you wouldn't feel ashamed of me just because I hadn't had educational advantages."

"Bless me," said Martin. "So you overheard what I said to Tom? You're a wicked eavesdropper, Sally, but I love you just the same."
