Looking Forward By Franklyn Waltman Publicity Director, Republican National Committee

Efforts of the Senate to recover Congress' power over the country's monetary system by ending the President's authority to devalue the dollar further brought out in strong and distinct lines the very worst features of Mr. Roosevelt and his New Deal. In that one episode were displayed the Roosevelt Administration's greed for power, its cunning, its suspicion of the democratic process, its tendency to misrepresent and mislead, and its contempt for legal order and orderly procedure.

Angered by the Senate's action Mr. Roosevelt stooped to the levels of the soap box demagogue and attempted to stir up class and sectional prejudices and hatreds by hauling out of its grave the old bugaboo of Wall street and the international bankers. Not only was his outburst like that of a child fearing loss of a stick of candy but it clearly indicated his distrust of all save his own wisdom.

But throughout it all Mr. Roosevelt kept doggedly away from the most important aspect of his dollar devaluation power, namely, the effect on prices of his 1934 action in cutting the gold content of the dollar down to 59 cents. He remained silent on that question because it constitutes one of the New Deal's outstanding failures. Let's go back and see what prompted the enactment of the temporary devaluation power in 1934.

Bankers Not Mentioned Then

Mr. Roosevelt knew, of course, that the international bankers were not having a field day when he asked for and was given the power to devalue the dollar. In asking for that power, he did not give as a reason that he wanted to end gambling in foreign exchange by international bankers. In fact, he didn't mention them at all. He would have known if they controlled foreign exchange operations. As president of United European Investors, Ltd., which played with German marks back in 1922, he knew all about that game.

Oh, no! When he asked for the devaluation power back in 1933 he said what troubled him was that there was no control of international exchange at all. In his fireside chat on October 23, 1933, he told the American people:

"Because of conditions in this country and because of events beyond our control in other parts of the world, it becomes increasingly important to develop and apply the further measures which may be necessary from time to time to control the gold value of our dollar at home.

"Our dollar is now, altogether too greatly influenced by the accidents of international trade, by the internal policies of other nations, and by political disturbance in other continents. Therefore the United States must take firmly in its own hands the control of the gold value of the dollar. This is necessary in order to prevent the dollar disturbances from swinging us away from our ultimate goal, namely, the continued recovery of our commodity prices."

Sought Price Rises

Note that the thing which disturbed Mr. Roosevelt was not gambles control of our dollars but the absence of any kind of control so that it was influenced by "accidents of international trade." And note the real objective, "continued recovery of our commodity prices."

Of course, Mr. Roosevelt doesn't want to say anything about that price objective now, which was, in truth, the milk in the cocoanut of his devaluation plans. Why? Because it was one of the most ghastly of the endless New Deal flops. He got his power to devalue the dollar. He devalued it to 59.6 per cent. What happened? Here is what the minority House committee report stated on the basis of its study of the proposed extension of the President's powers:

"Five years have elapsed since the dollar was devalued, five years in which prices could have risen as promised. Reference to the wholesale commodity price index, however, shows that the wholesale price of all commodities as of February, 1939, is only 76.9 per cent of the 1926 level as against 72.2 per cent in January, 1934, the last month before the dollar was officially devalued, an increase of but 6.5 per cent. Prices of farm products during the same period increased from 58.7 to only 67.2. Essentially the same situation is true with respect to raw materials, semi-finished and finished products. . . . This is far below the 69 per cent rise which it was confidently asserted would be brought about through devaluation."

That's why Mr. Roosevelt said nothing about the real objective he sought through dollar devaluation. No wonder he had to try to play upon the emotions of the American people and to try to stir up passion and fear—fear of Wall Street and of some mysterious enemy nation.

His Pretense False

Mr. Roosevelt knew how false and hollow was his pretense that taking the dollar devaluation from him would be to return it to the international bankers. He understood full well that what was proposed was merely to restore it to Congress. That, indeed, back in 1934, before he had become intoxicated with power, was his own objective. In a note which he penned at a later date to explain his devaluation proclamation of January 31, 1934, and which appears in his "Public Papers and Addresses," he stated this purpose as follows:

"To make more effective the control of our monetary system and of the metallic reserves of gold and silver as its base; AND TO MAKE CLEAR THAT IT BELONGS WHERE THE CONSTITUTION SAYS IT DOES — IN THE HANDS OF THE BANKERS AND THE SPECULATORS."

But now, apparently, Mr. Roosevelt places no faith in the wisdom of Congress or trust in the working of a democracy. He paints what to him is a nightmarish picture of Congress in an emergency struggling with dollar devaluation. Well, that may be pretty awful for a political leader with a Messianic complex who believes all wisdom begins and ends in him, but the picture of Congress attending to its own duties instead of delegating them to the executive branch of the Government is an inspiring sight for the American people. They do not fancy the "I am the law" attitude in the New Deal leadership any more than they fancy it in the case of Mayor Frank Hague.
