THE DAYS OF LONG AGO

Fifty-Five Years Ago

The Frontier, July 29, 1886
An amusing incident is still related in connection with the Indian sears among the settlers along the Niobrara river, which occurred in the summer of 1881. Some soldiers from Fort Randall, in search of deserters, had camped on the reservation side of the river. In the morning before starting out they discharged some of their pieces at a mark, when a cowboy who was loitering among the hills with his herd heard them, and imagining the reds were coming made for the settlement and gave the alarm. The rumor ran with the wind and costernation reigned supreme among the denizens. Their families and plunder were hastily put in wagons and with the greatest haste the motly procession headed for O'Neill. When the word was brought to one family that Indians were coming and that they must not lose a moment in getting out of the way, a member of the household, a sun-browned lass of sixteen begged time to run to the field to notify her lover who was plowing corn, of the danger. The leave was not granted as the lives of the women and children could not be imperiled to save one man, besides he had a horse and could take care of himself. But the undaunted maiden would not hear of it. Her lover must be saved, she ran to the field and told the young man of the awful peril. Without even stopping to unhitch from the single shovel plow he was using the brave (?) Adonis mounted and set out in the greatest speed for safety with the plow dangling behind him, leaving the girl to her fate.

W. A. Bridges' house on the hid is enclosed. It is the largest dwelling house in O'Neill and presents a very fine appearance.
Grant Saunders' sister Grace arrived in O'Neill last Thursday. She will go to Dustin to teach school, having been engaged in that vocation for several years.
George Mullen, living north of town, had the index finger of his right hand cut so badly the first of the week that amputation was necessary.
