Here's An Interesting Sketch About Baseball As Played Decades Ago

The great national game isn't what it used to be, in the opinion of Postmaster Harry A. Gooch of Sioux City, Iowa. Mr. Gooch began playing semi-professional baseball back in 1885, and brought his enthusiasm for the game with him when he located in Sioux City three years later.

A versatile fellow, Mr. Gooch played second base, and also caught behind the bat. Catching was listed as a hazardous profession in those days. Many of the old-time players suffered fractures of every finger on both hands and wound up their careers with twisted, gnarled hands.

The players used masks, but had no body protectors and gloves were almost unknown. Gooch recalls that he bought common kid's gloves to protect his hands and snipped off the fingers to give him a better hold on the ball. Despite those precautions, he carries two fingers which were broken in the game and never healed properly.

At the time Mr. Gooch went to Sioux City, official rules allowed the batter four strikes and seven balls. What's more, the batter had a voice in deciding what sort of pitch he would swing at. When he came to the plate the batter was asked whether he wanted a high or low ball. A high ball was supposed to pass him between the shoulder and the hip, and a low ball between the hip and the knee.

The catcher's position was about 50 feet behind the plate. He caught pitched balls on the bounce until the batter had used up three of his four strikes, or six of the seven balls. Then it was the usual thing for him to don his mask and advance to a position directly behind the bat.

Furthermore, there was no such things as an out on an infield fly. In the event of such a play, the runner on first base advanced to second and the batter went to first.

Mr. Gooch played in an eight-team city league in Chicago. Attendance frequently ran between 2,500 and 3,500 for the games, which were played in outlying sections of the city. Receipts were divided between members of the winning and losing teams.

The only big league baseball park in Chicago at that time was on Michigan avenue, between the Exposition building and the Randolph street viaduct.

Going to Sioux City in 1888, Mr. Gooch played with both the Cornhusker and the Court House semi-professional teams. Many of the games were played at Evans park, where the outfield fence was so far from home plate that it was impossible to knock a ball out of the park.

Recalling directions for reaching Evans park, in Sioux City, which vanished long ago from the city maps, Mr. Gooch says players took a small, mule-drawn street car out West Seventh street to Center street, then north to the bank of Perry creek, which was the end of the line.

Steps led down to a bridge which crossed the creek to the park. The park also had a track for horse racing and, when games were played, the catcher's position was on the race track.

Baseball was a serious business in those days. Players frequently became involved in feuds. Mr. Gooch recalls one occasion when a team sponsored by Dakota City, Nebr., was given a sound trouncing by Sloan, Iowa. Dr. Charles H. Maxwell, one of the backers of the Dakota City team, went to Sioux City and hired Mr. Gooch and a pitcher to take part in a return clash with the Sloan team. With Mr. Gooch behind the plate and a Sioux City pitcher in the box, Dakota City obtained its revenge and sent Sloan down in defeat. For his part in avenging the honor of Dakota City, Mr. Gooch received $15.—Sioux City Journal.

Baseball as played in the early 70's on the wide-open prairies by pioneer Nebraskans was different from the national pastime of today. According to a pioneer resident of Norfolk, Nebr., the first ball game in Antelope county was played in 1874 on the A. J. Leach homestead. The contest was between Cedar Creek and the Oakdale teams.

The players came early in the morning—some on foot, some on horseback, and others in lumber wagons—so that they might lay out the diamond before time for the game.

The umpire, who was comfortably seated in a willow chair, called the plays from the sidelines. About six o'clock the wives of the players arrived with a bounteous supper. So keen was the interest of the players that they could not be prevailed upon to stop the game for supper before the game was finished. They played until it was too dark to see any longer. Cedar Creek won by a score of 135 to 65.

Fast balls, curves, side arm, and other types of modern delivery were taboo. The players pitched the ball underhand, which probably was the reason why the scores were so large in early baseball.
